MEXICO.

A Terrible Earthquake at Colima—Many Persons Killed—Great Destruction of Property.

SAN FRANCISCO, Saturday, Jan. 9.

A letter from Colima, Mexico, gives an account of a terrible earthquake experienced in that city on the morning of Dec. 20. For several days previous the volcano of Colima, thirty miles from the city, exhibited symptoms of internal commotion, sending forth smoke and steam, accompanied by rumbling and shaking of the earth.

The morning of the 20th ult. was ushered in by a gentle rocking of the earth, which gradually increased in violence until the walls of the houses were cracked, and everything breakable was demolished. The vibrations were from the northeast to the southwest, and lasted nearly forty seconds. The Cathedral, a warehouse and several brick buildings were cracked from top to bottom. The people were startled from their sleep, and rushed frantically for the Plaza. It is reported that several persons were killed by the falling of the walls of the National Hotel.

The shock was felt a long dist nce in the interior. In several places the ground opened, trees were uprooted, hills leveled, water courses changed and a general upheaving of the earth took place.

At the City of Manzanillo the Cathedral building, which had stood shocks of earthquake and storms for over a century, was riven from top to bottom. Even the tiles on the roof were broken. Some eighteen or twenty persons were killed by the falling walls of the American Hotel, and three others were buried beneath the ruins of WASSERMAN & Co.'s warehouse.

Salnave's Campaign in the Southern Peninsula—Seven Towns Captured.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Hayti, Friday, Jan. 1.

President SALNAVE left Port-au-Prince on the 15th ult., with his two war steamers and troops, to make a campaign against the rebels in the Southern peninsula. He took the City of Miragoane, which was afterwards retaken by the rebels, when he again captured and partly destroyed it. A large quantity of logwood, ready for market, was found there. Six other towns along the coast were successively taken and held by SALNAVE. The inhabitants joined with the Government troops in driving the rebels out. On the 30th ult. the City of Aux Cayes made proposals to surrender. The President returned here today in his corvette, the Petion. He intends going back to the South in a few days to take possession of Aux Cayes. It is reported that the rebel chief NORMEIL was killed at Miragoane. It is thought that these successful movements of SALNAVE in the South will hasten the surrender of JACMEL and JEREMIE, and thus restore the authority of the Government throughout the entire peninsula. The cultivators in the interior are loyal to SALNAVE. In the North the rebels still hold the Port of St. Mark's, the Government having made no attempt as yet to take it. It is reported that the rebels there have recently received arms and ammunition from certain parties in Boston, who have formerly traded in the island.

On the 30th ult. the Government monopoly on coffee was removed, and the trade opened to competition under the following regulations: One-quarter of the coffee to be exported shall be given to the Government, including all charges of packing and delivery. The remaining three-quarters shall pay an export duty of two and a half gold dollars per 100 pounds, and 10 per cent of this amount, in addition. One-half of the duty is receivable in any certificates of indebtedness of the Government.

The export duty on cotton is fixed at one and a half gold dollars per 100 pounds, and 10 per cent, in addition, and on logwood at $1 per 100 pounds, and 10 per cent additional. Since the proclamation of the new export duties market prices are unsettled. Coffee is quoted at 4½@5¾ cents per pound; cotton, 11@12 cents; logwood, no prices. Before the new entry logwood was $2@$2 10 per 100 pounds. It is estimated that there are about 60,000,000 pounds of coffee in the country, and about 8,000,000 pounds of cotton. The Government estimates that its revenue under the new duties during the coming year will be not less than $5,000,000.

In port, schooner Lizzie Lee, from Boston, discharging; schooner H. D. Hart, bounded to Barocoa to load fruit for New-York under charter; brig O. Outis, from New-York, discharging.

She is manned with two twelve-pounders, seven six-pounders and two stern chasers, properly mounted, and is well supplied with small arms and ammunition. She has a full crew, consisting of Europeans, Americans and Manila-men; they are well drilled. It is not known for what purpose her heavy armament is intended. Vessels cruising among the Caroline Islands are warned of danger from the armed brig.

BALTIMORE, Md., Saturday, Jan. 9.

Chief Justice SCOTT, of the Supreme Bench of this city, assigned to the Baltimore City Court, today delivered an opinion in the habeas corpus case of HENRY DRESCHER, non-resident trader. DRESCHER is a resident of Newark, N. J., and was arrested and committed to jail on Dec. 11, last, charged with violating the act of the General Assembly of Maryland, which forbids any person, not a permanent resident of the State, offering or exposing for sale, goods, wares, &c., without first obtaining license to do so. The petition alleges that he is a citizen of the State of New-Jersey, and claims that he is not liable under said act; first, because the act in question is in violation of the eighth and tenth sections of the first article of the Constitution, and second, because said act is in violation of the second section of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States. Judge SCOTT decides that the Constitution of the United States does not give any control to Congress over the domestic trade of the States, and concludes as follows:

"I am of opinion that our State act in question is not in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and that the petitioner has no cause of complaint. It is, therefore, this 9th of January, 1869, adjudged and ordered that the petition be dismissed, and that the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the Warden until discharged in due course of law. The prisoner can be admitted to bail at any time."

DRESCHER was accordingly recommitted.

WASHINGTON.

The Political Situation in Mississippi and Georgia—The Alaska Investigation.

Special Dispatches to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Jan. 9.

The Reconstruction Committee had a long session this morning, at which the political situation in Virginia, Mississippi and Georgia was considered. Messrs. FIELD, of Mississippi, and STONE, of Georgia, were examined. FIELD testified to the old story of negro supremacy and oppression of the white population in the State. He was satisfied that negro suffrage was a failure and an outrage, and felt convinced that the franchise should be taken away from the blacks to insure peace and prosperity to the State. Mr. STONE told the oft-repeated tale of rebel inhumanity, intolerance and violence. He admitted, however, that the rebels have been somewhat subdued, and that the Ku-klux have been less active since the election of GRANT, and that the condition of affairs there is more satisfactory now than it has been at any time since the close of the war. Several members of the Committee are rather inclined to admit Virginia on the basis of the Constitution which she adopted some time ago. A leading Republican, Congressman said to-day that in many respects the Virginia Constitution was the best in America, and, in reference to the State of Georgia, he said he could find no just grounds for acceding to the demands of those who are here urging various schemes looking principally to a new deal of offices in the State.

LOUISIANA REVENUE MATTERS.

Mr. CRESCY, Internal Revenue Supervisor for Louisiana, pronounces wholly untrue the story recently published that he had received intelligence that every pound of tobacco seized by him in New-Orleans had disappeared from the warehouse and no trace to it could be found, and the Marshal was entirely ignorant as to how it had escaped the latter's custody. Collector TENADALE, at Alexandria, La., sent Mr. CRESCY a disrespectful dispatch on learning of his suspension.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Inauguration of Gov. Claflin—His Inaugural Address—Discussion of State and National Measures—The License Law—Eloquent Tribute to Gen. Grant.

From Our Own Correspondent.

BOSTON, Saturday, Jan. 9, 1869.

Gov. CLAFLIN was duly inaugurated Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts at noon today. There was a large attendance of persons to listen to his inaugural address. Mr. CLAFLIN being a public man of positive ideas, and radical on most social and political questions, considerable interest has been manifested to learn his views. His views upon the License Liquor law, it will be seen, are terse and statesmanlike. He also deals with the dry statistics of State matters in an interesting manner.

THE FINANCES.

Gov. CLAFLIN first discussed the finances of the State. He said that the existing debt of the Commonwealth may be summarily stated as follows:

Funded liabilities, Jan. 1, 1869.....$26,807,420 00
Temporary loans, Jan. 1, 1869..... 928,450 05
Total.....$27,735,870 05
Total amount of debt, Jan. 1, 1868..... 26,572,560 12
Increase during the year..... $1,163,314 93

The public debt may be classified as follows:

Railroad debt..... $9,142,176 00
Ante-war debt..... 1,092,000 00
War debt..... 16,573,244 00
Temporary debts..... 928,450 05
Total.....$27,735,870 05

Of the funded liabilities, the payment of all but $353,000 is fully secured by sinking funds, while the surplusage of their accumulation will be more than sufficient for the liquidation of the entire amount remaining unprovided for. A tax of $3,000,000 is necessary for the present financial year, unless provision is made for funding the public debt. Otherwise, $2,000,000 only will be necessary.

THE PUBLIC EDUCATION.

On the subject of education, the Governor said the amount granted for educational purposes in 1868 was $2,635,774 06, an increase over the year 1867 of $280,268 10. The amount granted is nearly $10 for every child between the ages of five and fifteen years in the State, and nearly $1 more than last year. The amount paid for the erection and repairs of school-houses during the same time was $1,495,573 78. Speaking of the inequalities in our system of public education he remarked that the most striking is the difference between the wages of the male and female teachers,—the average monthly pay of the male teachers being $72 93, while that of the female teachers is only $27 84. While our women are so poorly paid for this service, we can expect no great proficiency in teaching on their part, nor that they will pursue this occupation for any considerable length of time.

THE LIQUOR QUESTION.

On the liquor question the Governor spoke at great length. He said that the effect of the change in the law in regard to the sale of spiritnous and intoxicating liquors, made by the last Legislature, has hardly been fully developed, but, from such information as has reached him, it would seem to be unsatisfactory to the people generally, in every respect. For a quarter of a century the State had been free from the legal sale of intoxicating liquors, with slight exceptions in one or two counties. In nearly all of our towns and in some of the cities the open bar was unknown; it was a thing of the past, driven, with other injurious trades and employments, into secret places.

Speaking of the results of the present License Liquor law, the Governor said: "The increase of drunkenness and crime during the last six months, as compared with the same period in 1867, is very marked and decisive as to the operation of the law. The State prisons, jails and houses of correction are being rapidly filled, and will soon require enlarged accommodations. If the commitments continue to increase as they have since the present law went into force. It seems, then, essential for the public good that the present system should be abandoned, and that one should be adopted more in accordance with the habits and experience of the people." The Governor, however, says some provision should also be made for the sale of such liquors as are needed in the arts, and for medicinal and sacramental purposes. It may be wise, therefore, to consider the expediency of legalizing the sale by druggists and apothecaries of well-known standing and respectability, under careful restriction.

COMMERCE.

Alluding to the depression of commerce, the Governor says it is a consumable apathy that permits this important branch of business to languish; that allows a great nation to remain dependent, in time of peace, upon foreign ships to carry its exports and imports; that, in time of war, leaves it without shipbuilders or shipyards of the first class; and, in case of emergencies, without that indispensable resource as a mercantile marine—to furnish men for ships of war. Great Britain, in sustaining her ocean steamers by large subsidies, has displayed her accustomed foresight. She has again become mistress of the sea by her political sagacity, as she was formerly by her naval prowess. France, stimulated by the success of these measures, is vigorously following the example given—while to-day there is not one of the steamships connecting America with Europe that is owned by American citizens and sailing under the American flag. In view of this, Gov. CLAFLIN suggests the expediency and the importance of the Legislature, by memorial or otherwise, to express to our representatives in Congress our deep conviction that immediate and vigorous measures should be taken to relieve and foster this branch of national industry.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS—GEN. GRANT.

On national affairs, the Governor's views and reflections are as patriotic as they are statesmanlike. After referring to the issues of the late war, how they were squarely met, and triumphantly were saved the fruits of victory, Gov. CLAFLIN said: "Gen. GRANT goes into office with a larger majority than was ever given to any man since the formation of the Government, with a single exception. As it was predicted, his election already gives peace; and everywhere—both in the Old World and in the New—lovers of liberty and believers in the progress of humanity rejoice at this fresh evidence of the capacity of man for self-government, under the most difficult and trying circumstances. Gen. GRANT possesses the full confidence of the people and has their unwavering support. Tried by no ordinary tests in civil administration, he has proved himself equal to the demands made upon him, and inspires the people with the same confidence in his capacity for his new duties, that he always gave to the noble armies he commanded when entering on the field of battle. Without ostentation, unselfish, generous and patriotic, he labors to lift the standard of his country higher among the nations, and to elevate the human race. It is a matter for congratulation that this State,—one of the smallest in territory, and with less than one-twentieth of the population of the United States,—gave him and his distinguished associate a majority larger than any other, by more than twenty thousand. I also congratulate you, that while those in the minority felt it necessary to express their dissent at the ballot-box, they now join, with but few exceptions, in the general satisfaction, that the choice of the nation fell upon one whose fame as a soldier belongs exclusively to no party, and whose integrity is a pledge of justice to all."

Speaking of the equality of the black man with the white man, Gov. CLAFLIN said:

"The events of the war have made free all over whom the flag of the nation waves; but, as yet, all are not equal at the polls, either as voters or as candidates for office. A citizen of the Union should have the same privileges, whether his home is in Maryland or Massachusetts. Deny one man in Maryland his rights as to the suffrage or any other national matter, and the citizen of Massachusetts suffers as well as the disfranchised in Maryland. Let it, then, be made a part of the Constitution that suffrage on national questions shall be the same in every part of the Union; establish it in the organic law, and no change of parties can abridge the right; embrace the present opportunity, and the nation will reap the fruit of the victory. Failure now will bring doubt and uncertainty as to the future, and the friends of the ballot in other lands, while they are struggling for the right, will feel the loss, and lament our want of courage, persistency and fidelity to the great ideas which inspired our contest."

Gov. CLAFLIN'S Message is regarded as one of the ablest State papers ever issued. It has even drawn words of satisfaction from many of his political opponents.

THE PHYSICAL SCIENCES.

The Massachusetts Museum of Comparative Zoology—Prof. Louis Agassiz.

In his valedictory address to the Massachusetts Legislature, Hon. ALEXANDER H. BULLOCK, the retiring Governor of the State, alluded as follows to the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy, and the work done by Prof. LOUIS AGASSIZ:

I regret to have to communicate the resignation by Mr. WILLIAM GRAY of the position of a trustee of the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy. The act incorporating the trustees, (chapter 208 of the Acts of 1859,) provides that "the places of LOUIS AGASSIZ and WILLIAM GRAY, whenever the same or either of them shall become vacant, shall be filled by a concurrent vote of the Senate and House of Representatives." The retirement of Mr. GRAY from a place in which for nine years he has rendered such eminent services to the cause of education, marks a point in the history of this institution at which it may be neither unprofitable nor uninteresting briefly to review what have been its means and opportunities of usefulness, and what its improvement of them.

Since a period so recent as to be within the remembrance of all of us, the line of distinction between what were called the learned professions, and the other avocations of society have been in great measure effaced; or, perhaps I should rather say, various other avocations have come to share with these professions a degree of responsibility for the common welfare such as was not formerly recognized. With the development of manufactures and mines, of commerce, of railroads and telegraphs, a higher capacity to command, a clearer discretion in its exercise, and a more extensive education for its duties, have become necessary. The various establishments of instruction in the natural sciences (of which the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy is the most conspicuous) owe their development to this cause; and, in turn, they themselves foster and promote the very cause in which they had their origin. To conduct successfully a single great manufacturing establishment to-day, requires from young men the practical application of a degree of scientific knowledge, which fifty years ago was possessed only by a few, and was acquired by them only as the result of long lives of study. And the same may be said concerning many other employments of our time.

The institute of Technology, at Boston, to whose funds the State has largely contributed, the Lawrence Scientific School at Cambridge, and the Worcester School of Industrial Science, founded on a liberal scale by private munificence, are landmarks in the same line of progress. Although the first of these has been in operation less than three years, its influence is already felt by the whole community. The last, though not yet fully developed, is rapidly approaching a position of general importance, adding in its system of instruction a department for the practical application of the mechanic arts,—a purpose which it is interesting to note was contemplated by Congress in its grant of public lands which we have applied to endow the Agricultural College at Amherst. It would be pleasing in this connection to set forth details of the progress and condition of all these various institutions; but that would lead me into a dissertation beyond my purpose in speaking of the Museum at Cambridge.

When Prof. AGASSIZ came to this country twenty-two years ago, he at once begun to form a collection to illustrate the history of the animal kingdom, and on this expended all his private means, and involved himself under large pecuniary obligations beyond them. He accepted and held the office of a Professor in the Lawrence Scientific School of Harvard College, but the pecuniary aid which the college could afford him was very little; and the only storehouse for all his collections, including those gathered from his expeditions to Florida, and to the great northern lakes, was a small and ill-built wooden structure, part of which he was obliged to devote to rooms for his students, artists, and assistants. This, in 1856, was the condition of the nucleus of the present Museum.

But in that year the magnificent private subscription of twenty-five hundred names for the publication of his work on Natural History was made; and in 1857 the first volume was issued. The Museum was greatly increased by the specimens needed to illustrate this work; and at last public attention was attracted to its importance, and a private subscription which yielded over $72,000 was made in aid of it, the Legislature at the same time voting an appropriation of $100,000 to be paid from sales of the Back Bay lands. This appropriation was in singular conformity with that provision of the Constitution (part 2, chapter 5, section 2,) which made it "the duty of Legislatures and Magistrates" "to cherish the interests of literature and the sciences and all seminaries of them," and "to encourage private societies and public institutions" "for the promotion" among other things enumerated, "of a Natural History of the country."

On the death of Mr. FRANCIS C. GRAY, which occurred about this time, the Museum received the munificent legacy of $50,000, and in accordance with his request took its present name of the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy; and the act of incorporation was passed from which I have already quoted. In 1861, the Legislature voted an additional appropriation of $20,000; in 1863, the sum of $10,000 was voted for the publication of illustrated catalogues; in 1867, $10,000 for the arrangement of the great Brazilian collections; and in 1868, a further appropriation of $75,000, to be paid in three annual instalments of $25,000 each, conditional upon the raising of the same annual amount by private subscription. I had the pleasure of signing the warrant for the payment of the first instalment on the last day of the year which has just expired.

Excluding from consideration this last grant, the whole sum which the State has contributed to the Museum during the last ten years is $140,000; and during the same time it has derived from legacies and private gifts about $175,000; to all which must be added, what is hardly capable of being definitely computed, the sum spent meanwhile by Prof. AGASSIZ from his own earnings, and the tuition fees of his students, (which last, however, he has almost always remitted to them.) The investment of this total sum of about $315,000 has been substantially as follows: In a permanent fund, $150,000; in the building, $75,000; in the scientific expedition to the Amazon, more than $80,000, the whole of which was given for that special purpose by one individual, Mr. NATHANIEL THAYER, of widely-known liberality and public spirit; for the purpose of collections, of glass, alcohol and other material, upward of $50,000. During the same time there have been received as income of invested funds upward of $70,000, which have been expended in increasing and arranging the collections.

If, now, in behalf of the State and the community, we should undertake to strike a balance sheet, as a merchant would do in his business, and compute what has been gained to the public from this pecuniary investment, some of our gains might be enumerated as follows:

First—It has secured in Massachusetts larger and more complete collections in several grand departments of natural history than the British Museum or the Jardin des Plantes have acquired in a century or more. Government patronage.

Second—In the arrangement of these collections, even to the limited extent to which the pecuniary resources of the Museum have enabled it to be carried, it has presented to the scientific world a plan of classification and exhibition more admirable than was ever before attempted or even designed, its grand outline being to illustrate the plan of creation so far as it lies within the comprehension of the human mind.

Third—It has educated gratuitously a large part of the younger class of naturalists in this country, who now in turn are teaching in the schools and colleges of almost every State, and some of whom have already attained a reputation not limited to America; and in educating them it has afforded greater facilities for the comprehension of their special subject of study than they could have obtained anywhere else in the world.

Fourth—It has supplied free of charge to every trustworthy scientific man in America or Europe, who chose to apply, all the specimens in its possession for his free investigation—a purpose never before carried out on such a scale by any Museum.

Fifth—It has given courses of lectures every year, free of charge, on the higher branches of Natural History, to all teachers of either private or public schools who should choose to attend them.

Sixth—It has published a series of valuable scientific works and supplied material for many more.

And lastly, it has secured to the United States one who, without combat, is conceded to be not second to any philosophic zoölogist now living; who, during his residence of twenty years with us, has given to scientific pursuits in this country a new and previously unknown impulse; has made the scientific attainments and achievements of Americans known and respected abroad; and has concentrated in Massachusetts unequaled facilities and incitements for this class of studies.

All which has been accomplished at a cost less than that of a small cotton mill.

I have deemed it proper to invite attention to this recent feature of our system of education. It has been the most agreeable of my official duties to give frequent attendance at the schools, to become familiar with their wants, and to encourage the adoption of all unquestionable methods of advancing their influence. And, in retiring from that relation of duty to the institution of learning which the Constitution imposes upon the Executive, I take special pleasure in commending to public respect the example of the men and the seminaries that have been pioneers in adapting our system to our necessity. The five classical colleges of the Commonwealth are secure upon permanent endowments and certain patronage. The discipline and culture of their rich and varied instruction is imparted to constantly increasing numbers within their walls, and diffuses its beneficence over all classes. But, for the intense life of our time, for an age of commerce, mechanism and all the arts, yet other and specific policies and adaptations of education are needed. The work of supplying them has begun, and no degree of public or private favor in carrying on the work can exceed the demand.

NEW-YORK.

Ex-Gov. Fenton and the Senatorship.

From the Albany Express, Jan. 8.

The triumph in the Senatorial election of honest convictions, enduring principles and the pervading sentiment of the Republican Party, is the common desire of earnest men throughout the State. Individuals ought to be less than principles. The Republican Party is based upon profound moral and political convictions. To these the great body of its adherents are earnestly devoted, and to assure their complete ascendancy is the one impulse which animates the hearts of all true men.

Gov. FENTON has been and is a candidate for Senator only because it was felt that the use of his name would promote the paramount object—only because public sentiment pointed to him as the man under whose banner the desired victory might perhaps be most easily won. Other distinguished names have been mentioned in the same connection, and with the same purpose. Conspicuous among them has been that of Judge DAVIS. The eminent talents and exalted personal character of Judge DAVIS naturally turned many eyes to him as one whose election would be the triumph of the purest principles and would give us a Senator reflecting lustre upon the State, and faithfully representing the party.

The names of Gov. FENTON and Judge DAVIS were suggested by the same impulse. Between them there could not be any division, because they and their friends were alike devoted to the same high object. So controlling were these common interests, and so complete the common understanding, that Gov. FENTON was ready to step out of the way at any moment when it was thought that Judge DAVIS could best accomplish the common purpose. Judge DAVIS might have been during the present week, as he might have been a month ago, the sole candidate for the senatorship on the part of those who are adverse to the return of Mr. MORGAN. The question was more than once frankly submitted to him, and the decision rested entirely and absolutely with himself. Gov. FENTON'S single desire was that the great interests of the party represented by both should be successful,

CURRENT LITERATURE.

PALINODE

Still thirteen years: 'tis Autumn now
On field and hill, in heart and brain;
The naked trees at evening sough;
The leaf to the forsaken bough
Sighs not—"We meet again!"

Two watched yon oriole's pendant dome,
That now is void, and dank with rain,
And one—O, hope more frail than foam!
The bird to his deserted home
Sings not—"We meet again!"

The loath gate swings with rusty creak;
Once, parting there, we played at pain;
There came a parting, when the weak
And fading lips essayed to speak
Vainly—"We meet again!"

Somewhere is comfort, somewhere faith,
Though thou in outer dark remain;
One sweet, sad voice ennobles death,
And still, for eighteen centuries saith
Softly—"Ye meet again!"

If earth another grave must bear,
Yet heaven hath won a sweeter strain,
And something whispers my despair,
That, from an orient chamber there,
Floats down, "We meet again!"

DEVEREUX'S DREAM.

From "A Stable for Nightmares."

I give you this story only at second-hand; but you have it in substance—and he wasted few words over it—as Paul Devereux told it me.

It was not the only queer story he could have told about himself if he had chosen, by a good many, I should say. Paul's life had been an eminently unconventional one; the man's face certified to that—hard bronzed, war-worn, seamed and scarred with strange battle-marks—the face of a man who had dared and done most things.

It was not his custom to speak much of what he had done, however. Probably only because he and I were little likely to meet again that he told me this. I am free to tell you now.

We had come across one another for the first time for years that afternoon on the Italian Boulevart. Paul had landed a couple of weeks previously at Marseilles, from a long yacht-cruise in southern waters, the monotony of which we heard had been agreeably diversified by a little pirate-hunting and slave-chasing—the evil tongues called it piracy and slave-running; and certainly Devereux was quite equal to either métier; and he was about starting on a promising little filibustering expedition across the Atlantic, where the chances were he would be shot, and the certainty was that he would be starved. So perhaps he felt inclined to be a trifle more communicative than usual, as we sat late that night over a blazing pyre of logs and in a cloud of cavendish. At all events he was, and after this fashion.

I forget now exactly how the subject was led up to. Expression of some philosophic incredulity on my part regarding certa in matters, followed by a ten minutes' silence on his side pregnant with unwonted words to come—that was it, perhaps. At last he said, more to himself, it seemed, than to me:

"'Such stuff as dreams are made of. Well, who knows? You're a Sadducee, Bertie; you call this sort of thing, politely, indigestion. Perhaps you're right. But yet I had a queer dream once."

"Not unlikely," I assented.

"You're wrong; I never dream, as a rule. But, as I say, I had a queer dream once; and queer because it came literally true three years afterwards."

"Queer indeed, Paul."

"Happens to be true. What's queerer still, my dream was the means of my finding a man I owed a long score, and a heavy one, and of my paying him in full."

"Bad for the payee!" I thought. Paul's face had grown terribly eloquent as he spoke those last words. On a sudden the expression of it changed—another memory was stirring in him. Wonderfully tender the fierce eyes grew; wonderfully tender the faint, sad smile, that was like sunshine on storm-scathed granite. That smile transfigured the man before me.

"Ah, poor child—poor Lucille!" I heard him mutter.

That was it, was it? So I let him be. Presently he lifted his head. If he had let himself get the least thing out of hand for a moment, he had got back his self-mastery the next.

"I'll tell you that queer story, Bertie, if you like," he said.

The proposition was flatteringly unusual, but the voice was quite his own.

"Somehow I'd sooner talk than think about—her," he went on after a pause.

I nodded. He might talk about this, you see, but I couldn't. He began with a question—an odd one:

"Did you ever hear I'd been married?"

Paul Devereux and a wife had always seemed and been to me a most unheard-of conjunction. So I laconically said,

"No."

"Well, I was once, years ago. She was my wife—that child—for a week. And then—"

I easily filled up the pause; but, as it happened, I filled it up wrongly; for he added:

"And then she was murdered."

I was not unused to our Paul's stony style of talk; but this last sentence was sufficiently startling.

"Eh?"

"Murdered—in her sleep. They never found the man who did it either, though I had Durbec and all the Rue de Jérusalem at work. But I forgave them that, for I found the man myself, and killed him."

He was filling his pipe again as he told me this, and he perhaps rammed the cavendish in a little tighter, but that was all. The thing was a matter of course; I knew my Paul well enough to know that. Of course he killed him.

"Mind you," he continued, kindling the black brule-gueule the while—"mind you, I'd never seen the man before, never known of his existence, except in a way that—however, it was this way."

He let his grizzled head drop back on the cushions of his chair, and his eyes seemed to see the queer story he was telling enacted once more before him in the red hollows of the fire.

As I said, it was years ago. I was waiting here in Paris for some fellows who were to join me in a campaign we'd arranged against the African big game. I never was more in or anything of that sort than I was then. I only tell you this to show you that the thing can't be accounted for by my nerves being out of order at all.

Well: I was dining alone that day at the Café Anglais. It was late when I sat down to my dinner in the little salon as usual. Only two other men were still lingering over theirs. All the time they stayed they bored me so persistently with some confounded story of a murder they were discussing, that I was once or twice more than half-inclined to tell them so. At last, though, they went away.

But their talk kept buzzing abominably in my head. When the waiter brought me the evening paper, the first thing that caught my eye was a circumstantial account of the probable way the fellow did his murder. I say probable, for they never caught him; and, as you will see directly, they could only suppose how it occurred.

It seemed that a well-known Paris banker, who was ascertained beyond doubt to have left one station alive and well, and with a couple of hundred thousand francs in a leathern sac under his seat, arrived at the next station the train stopped at with his throat cut and minus all his money, except a few bank-notes to no great amount, which the assassin had been wise enough to leave behind him. The train was a night express on one of the southern lines; the banker traveled quite alone, in a first-class carriage; and the murder must have taken place between midnight and 1 A. M. next morning. The newspapers supposed—rightly enough, I think—that the murderer must have entered the carriage from without, stabbed his victim in his sleep—there were no signs of any struggle—opened the sac, taken what he wanted, and retreated. Idol and all, by the way he came, I fully indorsed my particular writer's opinion that the murderer was an uncommonly cool and clever individual, especially as I fancy he got clear off and was never afterward laid hands on.

When I had done that I thought I had done with the affair altogether. Not at all. I was regularly ridden with this confounded murder. You see the banker was rather a swell; everybody knew him; and that, of course, made it so shocking. So everybody kept talking about him at the Opera, and over the baccarat and bouillotte at La Topaze's later. To escape him I crept to bed and smoked myself to sleep. And then a queer thing came to pass; I had a dream—I who never dream; and this is what I dreamed:

I saw a wide, rich country that I knew. A starless night hung over it like a pall. I saw a narrow track running through it, straight both ways, for leagues. Something sped along this track with a hurtling rush and roar. Then something, that at first had looked like a red-eyed devil, with dark sides full of dim fire, resolved itself, as I watched it, presently, into a more conventional night express train. It flew along, though, as no express train ever traveled yet; for all that, I was able to keep it quite easily in view. I could count the carriages as they whirled by. One—two—three—four—five—six; but I could only see distinctly into one. Into that one with perfect distinctness. Into that one I seemed forced to look.

It was the fourth carriage. Two people were in it. They sat in opposite corners: both were sleeping. The one who sat facing forward was a woman—a girl, rather. I could see that; but I couldn't see her face. The blind was drawn across the lamp in the roof, and the light was very dim; moreover, this girl lay back in the shadow. Yet I seemed to know her, and I knew that her face was very fair. She wore a cloak that shrouded her form completely, yet her form was familiar to me.

The figure opposite to her was a man's. Strangely familiar to me, too, this figure was. But, as he slept, his head had sunk upon his breast, and the shadow cast upon his face by the low-drawn traveling cap he wore hid it from me. Yet if I had seemed to know the girl's face, I was certain I knew the man's. But as I could see, so I could remember, neither. And there was an absolute torture in this which I can't explain to you—in this inability, and in my inability to wake them from their sleep.

From the first I had been conscious of a desire to do that. This grew stronger every second. I tried to call to them and my tongue wouldn't move. I tried to spring toward them, to thrust out my arms and touch them, and my limbs were paralyzed. And then I tried to shut my eyes to what I knew must happen, and my eyes were held open and dragged to look on in spite of me. And I saw this:

I saw the door of the carriage where these two sleepers, whose sleep was so horribly sound, were sitting—I saw this door open, and out of the thick darkness another face look in.

The night, as I have said, was very dim, but I could see this face as plainly as I can see yours. A large yellow face it was, like a wax mask. The lips were full, and lustful and cruel. The eyes were little eyes of an evil gray. Thin yellow streaks marked the absence of the eyebrows; thin yellow hair showed itself under a huge fur traveling-cap. The whole face seemed to grow slowly into absolute distinctness as I looked, by the sort of devilish light, that it, as it were, radiated. I had chanced upon a good many damnable visages before then; but there was a cold fiendishness about this one such as I had seen on no man's face, alive or dead, till then.

The next moment the man this face belonged to was standing in the carriage, that seemed to plunge and sway more furiously, as though to wake them that still slept on. He wore a long fur traveling-robe, girt about the waist with a fur girdle. Abnormally tall and broad as he was, he looked in this dress gigantic. Yet there was a marvelous cat-like lightness and agility about all his movements.

He bent over the girl lying there helpless in her sleep. I don't make rash bargains as a rule, but I felt I would have given years of my life for five minutes of my lost freedom of limb just then. I tell you the torture was infernal.

The assassin—I knew he was an assassin—bent awhile, gloatingly, over the girl. His great yellow hands were both bare, and on the forefinger of the right hand I could see some great stone blazing like an evil eye. In that right hand there gleamed something else. I saw him draw it slowly from his sleeve, and, as he drew it, turn round and look at the other sleeper with an infernal triumphant malignity and hate the devil himself might have envied. But the man he looked at slept heavily on. And then—God! I feel the agony I felt in my dream then now!—then I saw the great yellow hand, with the great evil eye upon it, lifted murderously, and the bright steel it held shimmer as the assassin turned again and bent his yellow face down closer to that other face hidden from me in the shadow—the girl's face, that I knew was so fair.

How can I tell this? * * * The blade flashed and fell. * * * There was the sound of a heavy sigh stifled under a heavy hand. * * * *

Then the huge form of the assassin was reared erect, and the bloated yellow face seemed to laugh silently, while the hand that held the steel pointed at the sleeping man in diabolical menace.

And so the huge form and the bloated yellow face seemed to fade away while I watched.

The express rushed and roared through the blinding darkness without; the sleeping man slept on still; till suddenly a strong light fell full upon him, and he woke.

And then I saw why I had been so certain that I knew him. For, as he lifted his head, I saw his face in the strong light.

And the face was my own face; the sleeper was myself."

Paul Devereux made a pause in his queer story. Except when he had spoken of the girl, he had spoken in his usual cool, hard way. The pipe he had been smoking all the time was smoked out. He took time to fill another before he went on. I said never a word, for I guessed who the sleeping girl was.

"Well," Paul remarked presently, "that was a devilish queer dream, wasn't it. You'll account for it by telling me I'd been so pestered with the story of the banker's murder that I naturally had nightmare; perhaps, too, that my digestion was out of order. Call it a nightmare, call it dyspepsia, if you like. I don't, because—. But you'll see why I don't directly.

At the same moment that my dream-self awoke in my dream, my actual self woke in reality, and with the same ghastly horror.

I say the same horror, for neither then nor afterward could I separate my one-self from my other-self. They seemed identical; so that this queer dream made a more lasting impression upon me than you'd think. However, in the life I led that sort of thing couldn't last very long. Before I came back from Africa I had utterly forgotten all about it. Before I left Paris, though, and while it was quite fresh in my memory, I sketched the big murderer just as I had seen him in my dream. The great yellow face, the great broad frame in the fur traveling-robe, the great hand with the great evil eye upon it—everything, carefully and minutely, as though I had been going to paint a portrait that I wanted to make life-like. I think at the time I had some such intention. If I had, I never fulfilled it. But I made the sketch, as I say, carefully; and then I forgot all about it.

Time passed—three years nearly. I was wintering in the south of France that year. There it was that I met her—Lucille. Old D'Avray, her father, and I had not met before in Algeria. He was dying now. He left the child on his death-bed to me. The end was I married her.

Poor little thing! I think I might have made her happy—who knows? She used to tell me often she was happy with me. Poor little thing!

Well, we were to come straight to London. That was Lucille's notion. She wanted to go to my London first—nowhere else. Now I would rather have gone anywhere else; but, naturally, I let the child have her way. She seemed nervously eager about it, I remembered afterward; and seemed to have a nervous objection to every other place I proposed. But I saw or suspected nothing to make me question her very closely, or the reasons for her preference for our grimy old Pandemonium. What could I suspect? Not the truth. Had I only had it! If I had only guessed what it was that made her, as she said, long to be safe there already. Safe? What had she to fear with me? Ah, what indeed!

So we started on our journey to England. It was a cold, dark night, early in March. We reached Lyons somewhere about seven. I should have stayed there that night only for Lucille. She entreated me so earnestly and with such strange vehemence to go on by the night mail to Paris that at last, to satisfy her, I consented; though it struck me unpleasantly at the time that I had let her travel too long already, and that this feverishness was the consequence of over-fatigue. But she became pacified at once when I told her it should be as she wanted, and declared she should sleep perfectly well in the carriage with me beside her. She should feel quite safe then, she said.

Safe! Where safer? you might ask. Nowhere, I believed. Alone with me—surely nowhere safer. The Paris express was a short train that night; but I managed to secure a compartment for ourselves. I left Lucille in her corner there while I went across to the buffet to fill a flask. I was gone barely five minutes; but when I came back the change in the child's face fairly startled me. I had seen it last with the smile it always wore for me on it, looking so childishly happy in the lamp-light. Now it was all gray-pale and distorted; and the great blue eyes told me directly with what.

Fear—sudden, terrible fear—I thought. But fear? Fear of what? I asked her. She clung close to me half-sobbing awhile before she could answer, and then she told me—nothing. There was nothing the matter, only she had felt a pain—a cruel pain—at her heart, and it had frightened her. Yes, that was it; it had frightened her, but it had passed; but she was well, quite well again now.

All this time her eyes seemed to be telling me another story; but I said nothing; she was obviously too excited already. I did my best to soothe her, and I succeeded. She told me she felt quite well once more before we started. No, she had rather, much rather, go on to Paris, as I had proposed at the first. She absolutely insisted on it. I remember I thought that Lucille had made no mention of any other plan previously, as I say. I ascertained that I could get a carriage to myself for her. No one could come in? Then nothing could be better.

And so it was that she and I started that night by the Paris mail.

I made her up a bed of rugs and wraps upon the cushions; but she had rather rest her head upon my shoulder, she said, and feel my arm about her; nothing could hurt her then. Ah, strange how she harped on that.

She lay there, then, as she loved best—with her head resting on my shoulder, not sleeping much or soundly; uneasily, with sudden waking starts, and with glances round her; till I would speak to her. And then she would look up into my face and smile; and so drop into that uneasy sleep again. And I would think she was over-tired, that was all; and reproach myself with having let her come on. And three or four hours passed like this; and then we had got as far as Dijon.

But the child was fairly worn out now; and she offered no opposition when I asked her to let me pillow her head on something softer than my shoulder. So I folded a great thick shawl she was too well cloaked to need, and she made that her pillow.

We were rushing full swing through the wild, dark night, when she lifted up her face and bade me kiss her and bid her sleep well. And I put my arm round her, and kissed the child's loving lips—for the last time while she lived. Then I flung myself on the seat opposite her; and, watching her till she slept soundly and peacefully, slept at last myself also. I had drawn the blind across the lamp in the roof, and the light in the carriage was very dim.

How long I slept I don't know; it couldn't have been more than an hour and a half, because the express was slackening speed for its first halt beyond Dijon. I had slept heavily I knew; but I woke with a sudden, sharp sense of danger that made me broad awake, and strung every nerve in a moment. The sort of feeling you have when you wake on a prairie, where you have come across "Indian sign;" on outpost-duty, when your feldwebel plucks gently your cloak. You know what I mean.

I was on my feet at once. As I said, the light in the carriage was very dim, and the shadow was deepest where Lucille lay. I looked there instinctively. She must have moved in her sleep; for her face was turned away from me; and the cloak I had put so carefully about her had partly fallen off. But she slept on still. Only soundly, very soundly; she scarcely seemed to breathe. And—did she breathe?

A ghastly fear ran through my blood, and froze it. I understood why I had wakened. In my nostrils was an awful odor that I knew well enough. I bent over her; I touched her. Her face was very cold; her eyes glared glassily at me; my hands were wet with something. My hands were wet with her blood—her blood!

I tore away the blind from the lamp, and then I could see that my wife of a week lay there stabbed straight to the heart—dead—dead beyond doubting: murdered in her sleep."

Devereux's stern, low voice shook now so little as he spoke those last words; and we both sat very silent after them for a good while. Only when he could trust his utterance again he went on.

A curious piece of devilry, wasn't it? That child—whom had she ever harmed? I remember I thought that, in a dull, confused sort of way, when I found myself alone in that carriage with her lying dead on the cushions before me. Alone with her—you understand? It was confusing.

I pass over what immediately followed. The express came duly to a halt; and then I called people to me, and—and the Paris express went on without that particular carriage.

The inquiry began before some local authority next day. Very little came of it. What could come of it, unless they had convicted me of the murder of this child I would have given my own life to save?

They might have done that at home; but they knew better here, and didn't. They couldn't find me the actual assassin, however; though I believe they did their best. All they found was his weapon, which he must have purposely left behind. I asked for this, and got it. It gave their Police no clue; and it gave me none.

It was a plain, double-edged, admirably-tempered dagger—a very workmanlike article, indeed. On the cross hilt of it I swore one day that I would live thenceforth for one thing alone—the discovery of the murderer of old D'Avray's child, whom I had promised him to care for before all. When I had found this man, whoever he was, I also swore that I would kill him. Kill him myself, you understand; without any of the law's delay or uncertainty, without troubling bourreau or hangman. Kill him as he had killed her—to do this was what I meant to live for. There was war to the knife between him and me.

I started, of course, under one heavy disadvantage. He knew me, probably, whereas I didn't know him at all. When he found that his amiable intention of fixing the crime on me had been frustrated, it must, I imagined, have occurred to him that the said crime might very conveniently be fixed by me on him. And he had proved himself to be a person who didn't stick at trifles. It behooved me, therefore, to go to work cautiously. But I hadn't fought Indians for nothing; and I was very cautious. I waited very quiet till I got a clue. It was a curious one; and I got it in this way. It struck me one day, suddenly, that I had heard of a murder precisely similar to this already. I could not at first call the thing to mind; but presently I remembered—my dream. And then I asked myself this: Had not this murder been done before my eyes three years ago?

I came to the conclusion that the circumstances of the murder in my dream were absolutely identical with the circumstances of the actual crime. Yes; the girl whose face in that dream I had never been able to see was Lucille. Yes; the assassin whose face I had seen so plainly in that dream was the real assassin. In short, I believe the murder had been rehearsed before me three years previous to its actual commit:al.

Now this sounds rather wild. Yet I came to this conviction quite coolly and deliberately. It was a conviction. Assuming it to be true, the odds against me grew shorter directly; for I had the portrait of the man I wanted drawn myself the day after I had seen him in my dream. And the original of that portrait was a man not to be easily mistaken, supposing him to exist at all. The day I came across that sketch of him in that old forgotten sketch-book of mine, I was as sure he did exist as that I was alive myself. What I had to do was to find this man, and then I never doubted I should find the man I wanted. You see how the odds had shortened. If he knew me I knew him now, and he had no notion that I did know him. It was a good deal fairer fight between us.

I fought it out alone. My story was hardly one the Rue de Jérusalem would have acted upon; and, besides, I wanted no interference. So, with the portrait before me, I sat down and began to consider who this man was, and why he had murdered that child. The big, burly frame, the heavy yellow face, the sandy-yellow hair, the physiognomy generally, was Teutonic. My man I put down as a North German. Now there were, and are probably, plenty of men who would have no objection whatever to put a knife into me, if they got the chance; but this man, whom I had never met, could have no such quarrel as theirs with me. His quarrel with me must have been, then, Lucille. Yes, that was it—Lucille. I began to see clearly: a thwarted, devilish passion—a cool, infernal revenge. The child had feared something of the sort; had perhaps seen him that night. This explained her nervous terror, her nervous anxiety to stop nowhere, to travel on. In that carriage of that express train, alone with me—where could she be safer? This accounted, too, for her anxiety to reach England. He would not dare follow her there, she had thought, or, at least, could not without my noticing him. And then she would have told me. She had not told me before evidently because she had feared for me too, in a quarrel with this man. She must, innocent child as she was, have had some instinctive knowledge of what he was capable. Yes, it was that fear must anger, and her vendettas were as fiery as Corsican figures. Of all the examples we could cite, she seems about the fittest for our model.—London Saturday Review.

A PIPE OF TOBACCO.

From London Society.

The wind is loud this bleak December night,
And moans, like one forlorn, at door and pane;
But here within my chamber warm and bright
All household blessings reign.

And, as I sit and smoke, my eager soul
Somewhat at times from out the Past will win,
Whilst the light cloud wreathes upwards from the bowl
That glows so red within.

And of the Protean shapes that curling rise,
Fancy, god-like, so molds and fashions each
That dead hands live again, and kindly eyes,
And even dear human speech.

Often in this dim world two boys I see,
Of ruddy cheek and open, careless brow;
And one am I, my fond heart whispers me,
And one, dear Tom, art thou.

With many a rosy tint the picture glows—
Wild sport avenging school's hard tyranny,
Bright holidays, with games and fairy shows,
And shouts of frolic glee.

Till all melts into air. Upon my ears
Sweet bells sound softly through the Summer hours,
And Oxford, fairest city, slow upreares
Her glittering spires and towers.

And here by Isis' banks and Cherwell's stream,
And haunted Cumnor, and the hundred ways
Where thou and I, dear friend, were wont to dream,
My yearning spirit strays.

And now, 'neath chestnut avenues we tread,
Now by gray arch and lichen-covered wall;
Or on tranced ear, in pillared fanes, the dread,
Deep organ-thunderings fall.

And as the witching incense round me climbs,
I feel those wealthy Summer eyes once more,
When from full hearts we read our venturous rhymes,
Or favorite poet-lore.

And pausing, saw the still night drawing on,
And o'er the turret-roofs, serene and clear
Within their ordered spaces, one by one,
The solemn stars appear.

So in this odorous cloud full oft I see
Sweet forms of tender beauty; and a tone
Steals through the echoing halls of memory,
That these are all my own.

Yes,—though, dear Tom, Death's passionless cold hand
Hath thrust her sable cloud 'tween thee and me,
And thou art lying in an alien land,
Beyond the Atlantic sea.

THE MEDIEVAL BELIEF IN MIRACLES.—Miracles, ghostly apparitions, divine and demoniac interference with sublunary affairs, were matters which a man of the twelfth century would less readily doubt than of his own existence. To disbelieve in such would have been considered good prima facie evidence of unsoundness of mind. The critical powers then were never for a moment exerted on an alleged case of miracle. If the matter could, by any interpretation, be brought into some kind of connection with heaven or hell, with moral good or evil, it was assumed to be natural, not unnatural, that miracles should occur. The modern definition of a miracle, viz., a violation of the laws of nature, would have by no means commanded BERNARD's assent. He would have said, "What are your laws of nature? I know them not. Miracle is the law of God." The men of that time believed that the air swarmed with angels; or, if not with angels, then with devils. They believed that fearful and perpetual strife was being waged between the adverse hosts—that armies of good and evil spirits were forever on the wing—that they encamped in invisible companies to waylay and deceive, or to counsel and succor, the sons of men. They believed they heard the laughter of the fiends borne on the night gusts of the moaning wind, and gradually retiring before the chorus-song of rejoicing angels, swelling up on the morning air. They believed that all evil thoughts were whispered in the air by the emissaries of the old enemy of man's soul, and that nothing but prayer, faith and the help of the blessed saints would avail to avert or dispel them.

No expression of disgust or contempt is required now with reference to such a stage of human belief. The great majority of mankind have ever held opinions similar to, or identical with, the above. The exception is to hold the reverse, and to substitute for Miracle a reliance on Law. Intrinsically, then, these groundless beliefs are nothing but silly tales, with little merit of either variety or invention. But, regarded historically, as stages in men's mental development, they assume quite a philosophic importance. Even as fossil bones and shells to a geologist become hieroglyphics significant of far-off revolutions and convulsions of the planet, so to the historian the great but extinct modes of thought which have appeared in the intellectual world are really the most important of the facts and events he has to record. When Peter of Cluny tells us that "very often the devils disturb the monks during the hours allotted to sleep, in order that they may feel sleepy when they ought to be awake, and thus lose the advantage of holy vigils—that he had often heard such complaints from many, of whom some have had their bed-coverings pulled off them while they slept, and carried to a great distance; some, after a struggle, had succeeded in wresting their coverings from the demons; while others, when in the act of satisfying the wants of nature, had seen the devils stand before them in a mocking, ridiculing attitude;"—we can regard the whole as an absurd fiction, if we choose, and in this light it is uninteresting enough. But, if we remember and reflect who the venerable PETER was—how wise he was, how good he was, and what a leader of thought he was in his day—then the fact that it was possible for such a man to hold such absurdities as literally true, assumes a different aspect. The minds of men of the twelfth century were in some sort the reverse of ours. What we think or well know to be possible and feasible, men of the Middle Ages would have regarded as the idlest dreaming. What we know to be simply nonsense, they looked on as a matter of indisputable truth. They were far removed from being "ministers and interpreters of nature." They did not worship the powers of nature as their Pagan ancestors did, but they had fully the same belief in the capriciousness of their exercise, they had the same anchorless insecurity as to what the invisible world would next do to, and in, the visible world. The men they saw, the trees, the houses, the green earth, the forest, were alternately possessed and quarreled over by the unseen powers of good and evil, and poor, feeble man had to pick his way in the midst of them; on either side of his path, at all hours of sleeping or waking, his mind and his heart were the desired prize of one or the other. The deliberately wicked man was given over for the time, in full property, to the fiend. The good, the deeply holy man, was surrounded by choirs of angels; and the devils were supposed almost to howl at his approach. He was changed, he was another creature to their believing eyes; he was in direct correspondence with God; the breath of the Divine love had robed him in beauty. Could there be any difficulty in thinking that to such a one—one on whom the smile of the Eternal was supposed to rest; one whose thoughts moved, like the angels in Jacob's dream, to and fro between earth and heaven; one whose future glory in the kingdom of the just was well assured—would it have been possible to doubt that to such a one the forms and things of this miserable, accursed earth would yield a swift obedience as of servants to their lords? Could inert matter, which even the very devils were able to work upon, resist a holy man full of the Spirit of God? Must not the earthly give way to the Heavenly? Must not Christ be the conqueror of Satan?—Morrison's Life and Times of St. Bernard.

THE TURNING DERVISHES OF STAMBOAL.—Suddenly, all fell forward on their hands, with a noise which startled me, and in prostrate adoration touched the floor with their foreheads. Then uprose each dervish, and dropping his robe upon the matting behind him, stood up in dancing costume—a short white jacket open upon a white shirt, a long white petticoat trailing an inch upon the floor, the hem lashed with a little lead. The aged imam lifted himself up, and bowing profoundly to the naturib—which, beyond a foreground of fezzed and turbanned Turks, was simply ornamented with gilded verses from the Koran, and the acknowledgements of bequests to the fraternity from Sultans and other great people—turned in passing to the other side of his pelt and repeated the bow. Followed by the white-clad dervishes who mutely imitated his bows, and turning before the mihrab, all slowly and in single file encircled the arena three times, bowing in the same manner each time they passed the eastern side. The music kept slow and solemn measure still; their movement, and after the third tour was finished the imam resumed his seat, while the dervishes, as they placed to his right hand, commenced waltzing, the music becoming louder and its time quicker. Without any apparent manœuvre they so arranged themselves that two concentric rings pirouetted around a central dervish, who precisely kept his ground beneath the pendant glass chandelier.

Their action would drive the best waltzer in Europe mad with envy. With folded arms they glided into the waltz, their petticoats gradually expanding till they assumed the shape of an inverted wine-glass, and with their arms extended—their hands open, one palm upward, the other downward, their head inclining to the right side—they sailed onward, the double motion of their orbit performed with mathematical precision and wondrous grace. The position of their hands signifies the acceptance, with that uplifted, of the gifts of heaven, and the rejection, with that downturned, of the things of earth. Nevertheless, the faces of the dervishes expressed their concern for those very earthly things, their big, coarse feet, and their properly rapid motion over the polished floor; but others, with nearly closed eyes and slightly open mouth, seemed, indeed, to be serenely dreaming of things afar off and immaterial. You will not laugh at me, I trust, when I assure you that several of these men who before the turning commenced had appeared clumsy, soulless creatures, now became positively beautiful by their abstraction in the dance, and what was most extraordinary, they kept up this waltz à deux temps for half an hour without once coming in contact with each other, though in the circles there was not more than a foot of space between the whirling petticoat of each dervish.

Twice the oldest of their brotherhood, who kept on his blue robe and did not dance, walked between the circles, pausing for ten seconds between each footstep. To see this old man, with very solemn face and tragic walk, passing between the whirling white dancers like a being of another world, never once moving his head to right or left, though I expected that every moment their hands, whisking past his ears, would box them soundly, was a most strange spectacle, and the whole ceremony, which consisted in the dance, renewed after a short pause, introduced me unconsciously to the infectious spirit of these rites, which is mental abstraction.—Arthur Arnold.

WHY THERE ARE SO MANY OLD MAIDS.—"It is very hard for a woman to know what to do," continued Emily, "but if she is to marry, I think she had better marry a fool. After all, a fool generally knows that he is a fool, and will trust some one, though he may not trust his wife." "I will never wittingly marry a fool," said Nora, "You will marry Mr. Glascock, of course. I don't say that he is a fool; but I do not think he has that kind of strength which shows itself in perversity." "If he asked me, I should not have him; and he will never ask me." "He will ask you, and, of course, you'll take him. Why not? You can't be otherwise than a woman. And you must marry. And this man is a gentleman, and will be a peer. There is nothing on earth against him, except that he does not set the Thames on fire. Louis intends to set the Thames on fire some day, and see what comes of it." "All the same, I shall not marry Mr. Glascock. A woman can die, at any rate," said Nora. "No, she can't. A woman must be decent; and to die of want is very indecent. She can't die, and she mustn't be in want, and she oughtn't to be a burden. I suppose it was thought necessary that every man should have two to choose from; and therefore there are so many more of us than the world wants."—"He Knew He was Right," by Anthony Trollope.

COOKED THISTLES.—Ude says that thistles are not much relished in England, "but in France are held in the highest estimation." Thistle is an entremet usually selected by a French chef to try the skill of a new cook. Chardons are delicious, stewed with Spanish sauce, and mix well with poached eggs. They are perfect with marrow or with white or velouté sauce. The Spanish thistles are the best, being of the artichoke race. A French epicurean writer says, "this dish is the ne plus ultra of human science, and a cook who can cook thistles well is entitled to rank as the first artist in Europe." Under the old régime, the light of glory shone especially on the powdered wig of the Count DE TESSE, first groom of MARIE ANTOINETTE. He was lost in the flight of the emigrés, and never came to the surface again. Thistles en malgre and au parmesan are not difficult to cook and are extremely good. Persons of inferior genius should endeavor to acquire glory by first cooking their thistles in the humbler styles. —Dickens' All the Year Round.

THE USES OF VANITY.—The Pacha rested by the fountain, the flowing waters of which made an oasis in the desert. His horse and his camel cropped with delight the green herbage near the fountain. Their shadows lay strongly and darkly upon the grass.

"How beautiful," said the horse, "is that dark form which moves as I move; what grace, what symmetry it shows! I can hardly eat for looking at it."

"It is well enough," said the camel, "but look at this one which moves with me. It has all the symmetry and grace of the other; and then, too, it has that pretty little hump on its back."

A dervish passing by, who knew the language of all the beasts, exclaimed: "How good is Allah, who gives to every creature its due share of vanity, so that defects seem to their owners especial beauties and merits!"

PARTRIDGES TURNED INTO FISH.—A Spanish Bishop, once on a journey on a Friday, turned in at an inn, and, having sent out his servant to buy fish, the man came back and told his master he could find no fish for sale, but only two partridges. The Bishop bade him go and buy them, and cook them, and serve them up. The servant in amazement—for he thought till then they had been bought for Sunday—asked the Bishop whether he was going to eat them when flesh was forbidden on a day like that. "Yes, and I mean to use them instead of fish." And then he went on, when his servant was more and more in amazement at his answer: "Know you not that I am a priest; whether is it greater to make Christ's body out of a bit of bread, or fish out of partridges?" Then, having made the sign of the cross, when he had bidden them to turn into fish, he ate them as fish.

VERY FRENCHY.—The last letter penned by BERRYER cannot be read with unmitigated satisfaction by the Emperor. It has a curious air about it. Imagine an Englishman on his death-bed saying he was going to heaven on a special political mission, and proclaiming that in order to be properly accredited for this purpose he had accepted the consolations of the Church. Here are the words, and let our readers judge if we have misinterpreted their meaning: "I bear these wishes to heaven for Your Majesty, Her Majesty the Queen, and our dear France. That they may be less unworthy to be heard by God, I quit life armed with all the succors of our holy religion."—London Review.

The Velocipede Mania.

The velocipede mania is rapidly spreading in this City, and attacks young and old alike. The condition of the streets this Winter has not been favorable for out-door dissemination of the disease, but one needs only to look into the various schools where persons are first inoculated for it, to become convinced of its wide-spread prevalence. It is but a short time since the first velocipede introduced into this City created wonder and amazement among all classes, yet at the present day all are becoming so familiarized with them as to be not only willing but anxious to mount the fiery steed. There are now four large establishments in the City engaged in the manufacture of velocipedes of various patterns, but with all their resources they are unable to supply the demand, and a person ordering one is fortunate if he is able to get it inside a month. Two months ago or thereabouts two young men named PEARSALL, knowing the good qualities of the velocipede, and believing that they must become popular, secured a loft at the corner of Broadway and Twenty-first-street, and opened a school for instruction and practice in the use of the machine. They were modest in their expectations, thinking that ten or fifteen persons would probably want to learn the use of the velocipede. The business grew upon their hands, and instead of the ten or fifteen pupils whom they expected, they now have two hundred and twenty. They have been obliged to take a second loft and to keep both open day and night. The second loft is devoted exclusively to the use of beginners, and it is here the ambitious velocipedian gets his first tumbles and bumps, undisturbed by the unsympathizing. As soon as he has gained control of the machine he is transferred to the other room, where he may take his exercise among the experts. Visitors are admitted to this hall, and ladies frequently patronize the performers by their presence. THE MESSRS. PEARSALL being still unable to accommodate all who would learn, are about opening another room in Brooklyn. As the instances of some Western gentlemen may, on these days next, open a school in Chicago also. Last night their establishment was crowded, and there must have been as many as twenty-five velocipedes in motion running about the room, some mounted by gray-haired men and others by boys of twelve and fifteen. There was quite an exciting race between a gentleman at least fifty years of age and his bright little boy not more than ten. The race resulted in favor of youth and vigor, the old gentleman giving out on the home-stretch, and failing to reach the winning post. One of our local journalists practices here daily, and has acquired considerable proficiency. He occasionally upsets a stray politician as jostles against some railroad stock jobber, but these are incidents which lend an appetizing zest to the exercise. Considered simply as exercise, without entertaining any idea of putting it to practical use, learning the velocipede is a good thing to do. Pupils are taught how to manage the machine, furnished with a two-wheeled Bucephalus and a place to exercise him for three months, for a sum that would scarcely suffice to keep an ordinary smoker in cigars for a week. When the bright pleasant weather of Spring comes, and our highways are put in a tolerably fair condition, the streets will doubtless be alive with velocipedes, while the Park and all country roads will be converted into regular race courses. Mr. BONNER, with his Dexter and Pocahontas, and Commodore VANDERBILT, with his fast horses, will need to look to their laurels.

ITALY.

Parliament—Absence of Political Excitement—Appreciation of American Government—Disposition of the Remains of Rossini—Personal.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Tuesday, Dec. 15, 1868.

There is a more entire absence of political excitement just now, in Italy, than for several years. The proceedings of Parliament are without interest, and although there is work enough to do of an exclusively business character, it is difficult to keep the members together. The indifference of so many of the Deputies to the duties to which they are pledged is bringing upon them severe blame in the newspapers, and various modes are suggested for producing a reform. Italian political life is confined mostly to the cities and considerable centres of population. Among the great mass of the population it is next to impossible to awaken an interest in public affairs. There are only about 400,000 legal voters in a country of twenty-four millions of inhabitants, or one in sixty of the whole number. Many of these never exercise the right which belongs to them. If the taxes are moderate and there is no inconvenient pressure, the majority care little whether the country is governed by an absolute monarchy or by a Constitution and Parliament.

REFORM OF THE CIVIL ADMINISTRATION.

Italy has a scheme for the reform of the civil administration, and its discussion will soon begin in Parliament. Those among politicians who cannot live without excitement, are hoping for an animated and even angry debate; for with such the object is to vex the Ministry. Now that the Eastern Question is once more demanding attention, this Government is accused of not having a policy. As Italy must follow rather than lead in questions involving minor interests of foreign policy the wisdom of waiting on circumstances is sufficiently clear.

THE SELF-GOVERNING POWER OF AMERICA.

The decision of the American people in the late elections to maintain the policy which the war evolved has surprised few intelligent observers in Europe, for such a determination had already been foreshadowed. The wonderful self-governing power of the nation has excited more surprise. The Opinione, the moderate and sensible half-ministerial organ here, in a recent article upon the working of the constitutional system in different countries, cites, as usual, the examples of England and the United States in proof of its adaptation to produce gradual reforms. "But, more important and worthier of greater attention is the example of political virtue, which in their public life, the Americans have shown in the recent elections. They have just emerged from a civil war of colossal proportions, a struggle which excited to the last degree popular passion; indeed far beyond anything we have known in the smaller trials we have been called to bear, in arriving at the results which we have thus far secured. * * * The Americans have had the good sense to understand that for every situation qualified men are needed, and that those in every way suited to sustain a violent position, like that of the ever-memorable struggle of the civil war, are out of place in entirely changed circumstances, such as those of the present period of conciliation. The Americans have consolidated the principle of unity by the election as the head of the State of the one who is its most glorious personification. * * But these are not so much the fruits of a form of government or particular constitution, as the merit of that Anglo-Saxon race, which, whether under republic or constitutional monarchy, exhibits that practical sense which distinguishes it from the other races."

ROSSINI.

Italy is to have the remains of ROSSINI, and they are to rest in Santa Croce. A letter from the widow of the great maestro was read at the last meeting of the Municipal Council of Florence, acceding to the request made by that authority, that Italy should have the body of her illustrious son. The condition is that the ashes of the widow shall rest in a neighboring cell. Arrangements had already been made for funeral ceremonies in Santa Croce in honor of ROSSINI, and they took place yesterday. These, however, were but preliminary to a more imposing pageant, to be witnessed in the same place when the body is received. Yesterday a requiem mass, by MOZART, was performed, in which a chorus of eighty voices, and an orchestra of the same number of instruments, took part. The tribune was hung with funeral emblems, and over the great entrance was this inscription:

"In this temple of national glory, the Government of the King of Italy renders solemn funereal honors to GIOACHINO ROSSINI. By the side of the monuments of those who have magnified the Italian name, his remains will be deposited.—Lord of the Omnipotent Art, in which all races of men and all lofty and generous affections find a common language, and by which eternal harmonies are revealed."

The two branches of the national Parliament and the other departments of the Government were represented. A concourse of six or eight thousand persons filled the aisles of the church, and other thousands, on the platform before the building, waited their turn to enter. The music gave the principal interest to the occasion, and the name of ROSSINI awakened memories of similar enjoyments equally beautiful and less sad.

CONFLICTS WITH THE BRIGANDS.

The Italian conflict with the brigands is somewhat like our Indian war. In an encounter near Catanzaro last week with the desperate band of PALMA, about fifteen soldiers lost their lives. The brigands remained masters of the field, or rather of the mountain citadel which they have made their hiding place. A daring and a skill in strategy is shown by some of the leaders, which would do honor to the State if employed in its service in legitimate warfare.

SENTENCE OF REVOLUTIONISTS.

The Roman Tribunal has passed sentence upon another batch of those connected with the revolutionary attempt of last year. The present is the case of the house in the Trastevere quarter, in which a deposit of arms was discovered, which the band defended with desperate resolution. Two of the unfortunate men go to the guillotine, and several others are condemned to imprisonment in the galleys for life, or for a long term of years.

PERSONAL.

GAVAZZI is here preaching, and denouncing as violently as ever the Papal system. He has lost none of his vigor, and crowds flock to listen to his stirring eloquence. It will be a marked day in history when such words as he utters are heard within the walls of Rome; and that day may be nearer than we suppose. What we have witnessed here would hardly have been believed possible twelve years ago.

The King goes to Turin to pass the Christmas season. He will return to Florence for the usual reception at the Pitti Palace on the first day of the year. On the 5th of January he leaves for Naples; a visit which has been for some time promised. Mr. LONGFELLOW sets off for Rome to-morrow, where the rest of the Winter will be passed. Our country is now largely represented here. AMERICUS.

THE RELIEF OF BROADWAY.

The Broadway Squad as Regulators of the Travel—Their Difficulties—A Semaphoric Telegraph to be Worked by the Police Suggested.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The only thing that keeps Broadway open at all is the "Broadway Squad." Practical experience has demonstrated that the partial regulation and direction of Broadway travel, which is maintained by this part of the Metropolitan Police, is the most successful of all the various means which have been devised to prevent the absolute blockade of that over-crowded thoroughfare. The ingenuity with which the Police disentangle the apparently inextricable mass of vehicles, which in spite of their utmost precaution and activity sometimes gather at the busiest points, has often attracted the attention and elicited my most profound admiration, as perhaps of many other New-York residents.

But every now and then, as every one knows, a blockade will occur, and hours are frequently spent in setting the current of the street in its proper motion again. I have noticed that the disentangling process has invariably to be begun a block or two away from the central point where the "jam" first occurred; and that those vehicles which were last involved in the jumble being the first to be relieved by being ordered to turn back or into side or cross streets. I find that these "jams" are caused by the absence of all direction of drivers at a distance, and of all instantaneous cooperation between the Police. Each one has to act for himself, and, necessarily, in the din and confusion of a jam, he can be seen and heard only for a few yards. It is absolutely necessary, in order to disentangle a jam, that he should be able to direct the drivers for at least a block up and down the street, else he has no outlet by which to turn off the rapidly accumulating mass of vehicles which every moment add to the complication. The tallest and loudest of the "Broadway Squad" can only make himself visible to and heard by the drivers who are within a few feet of him. Another and even graver cause of blockades is the absence of all direction by the Broadway Police of the travel outside of Broadway. All roads (or streets) in New-York lead into Broadway, and teams from the side streets are driven into and across Broadway without regulation as to speed and numbers. In other words the "Squad" in charge of the main channel for city travel has no control whatever over its inlets and outlets, and as a necessary result cannot wholly regulate its currents.

The idea has occurred to me that the "Broadway Squad" would have less difficulty in preventing than in disentangling these "jams" if the policemen at the more crowded points were provided with the necessary means of communicating with each other, and of directing the drivers of vehicles for several blocks north and south and on the cross streets by a signal. Why may not the system employed for the regulation of railroad trains at crossings and junctions be employed to relieve Broadway by preventing its frequent blockade? At Newark, N. J., on two railroad tracks, trains pass each other once in every ten minutes, and their drivers are directed as to speed and route, and kept informed of the condition of the roads at the point of convergence by a single flagman and a few switch-tenders. At the Clapham Junction, near London, England, seven hundred trains pass at full speed every day, crossing and shifting on each of several tracks in every direction at the rate of one every two minutes; yet the running of these trains in this quick succession is regulated by a single signal man, who not only directs the switch-tenders, but keeps the drivers of the various approaching trains, when they are a mile distant from the station, advised as to the state of the road and switches. The English system for regulating the running of trains at great points of convergence of the lines is now most admirable, having been perfected by practical men after many years' experience. Originally the station masters at all junctions and crossings made the signals with their arms; then flags and lanterns were used as on our railroads at present; next fixed posts with movable arms of various shapes; now regular machines are employed, on which the station master plays as on the piano, the handles of the levers which move the signals standing in lieu of keys.

A modification of this last instrument might be adopted with satisfaction for the regulation of Broadway travel; or the simpler fixed signal posts, with movable arms, each position having a meaning soon learned by the drivers as well as the policemen, would answer all practical purposes. If, for instance, the policemen who are detailed to guard Broadway at Fulton-street had a signal post by which they could direct travel as far south as Wall, as far north as Cortlandt, and east and west through Fulton-street for two or three blocks, it is easy to see that the numerous blockades at that crowded junction could be often prevented. The signal might consist of an iron post surmounting a gas lamp; the top divided into four arms, which when closed would indicate that the road was unobstructed, but outstretched at various angles would convey different meanings. If a blockade should be threatened the arms of the signal post could be fixed by the policeman at the point "Danger," or arms with that word on them could be displayed so as to be seen in all directions; if a fire should occur in the vicinity and it should be desirable to keep the street open, the arm could be directed to the point "Fire;" the drivers at a distance would naturally turn aside to avoid becoming involved in the blockade, or if refractory the several Police at a distance could compel them to take other routes. The travel being for the time stopped the blockade would not extend beyond control, and the result would be the early disentanglement of those vehicles involved. When the signal "Safety" is again set by the policeman, travel would resume its old route.

If the simplest sort of such signal posts which would form a semaphoric telegraph were erected at the intersection of Broadway with Wall, Cortlandt, Fulton, Chambers, Canal, Bleecker and Tenth streets, in such positions and at such heights as to be visible, not only through Broadway, but two or three blocks east and west through the cross streets named, Broadway would never be greatly obstructed, or for any length of time. Such a system or any other which would give each policeman the control of travel for at least one block from his station would prevent many of the "jams" now so frequent, and really unavoidable under present regulations.

These suggestions, I think, might be experimented upon by the Police or other City authorities with desirable results. The plan has, at least, one or two great advantages over any other which has been suggested for relieving Broadway; it can be carried out at little expense and will excite the opposition of no large moneyed interest to its practical execution, as have the various schemes for widening and extending other parallel streets.

A great deal might also be done by a few sensible members of the "Broadway Squad" for the relief of Broadway to pedestrians if they would enforce the old rule of the road—"turn to the right as the law directs." If pedestrians were compelled to walk on the right side of the sidewalk, instead of alternating from left to right and right to left as they are allowed to do now, walking in Broadway would be much more pleasant. I do not mean that those going up should be forced to take one side of the street, and those going down the opposite side. That is impracticable; but if the two streams of people on the same sidewalk were to pass alongside of each other, each being distinct in itself and not mingling in great confusion as at present, the result would be the increase of speed and the augmentation of the pleasure of walking in the street. Then, instead of persons being compelled to "stand aside until the procession passes," the two processions could continually pass each other without obstruction. WILLIAM F. G. SHANKS.

THE MAGNESIUM LIGHT.

What it is and how it is Operated—Its Introduction into this City—The New Method of Manufacturing Oxygen Gas.

Most of our readers may be aware that the Magnesium light has already been introduced into this City, and that its brilliancy is nightly radiated from the windows of some of our prominent Broadway stores, rendering the adjacent gas lights sickly and dim by comparison, and even casting those lights nearest to it into absolute shade.

The magnesium light is not a new discovery. Some twenty-five or thirty years ago Lieut. DRUMMOND, of the British navy, discovered that a stream of carburetted hydrogen, (coal gas,) if mingled with a stream of pure oxygen, and the two allowed to impinge on some substance not easily fusible, would produce a light of intense brilliancy. Dr. HARE, of Philadelphia, also made known the same fact about the same time, and is perhaps entitled to the merit of the discovery. Such, however, was the intense heat produced by the combustion of the two gases that metals of all kinds were almost instantly fused by it. Iron, steel, and platinum, burned with a bright flame and disappeared. Even the diamond could not withstand the intense heat. After the trial of various substances, it was found that calcium (common lime) was about the only substance that would withstand the heat, and that could be used for the two gases to impinge upon. Hence the new light was known as the calcium. Within a few years past, however, BUNSEN suggested that magnesium would be a better substance than calcium, as the latter absorbed moisture from the atmosphere and crumbled away. Accordingly the oxide of magnesium was tried, and found to be admirably adapted for the purpose, as it is easily obtainable, fuses very slowly, and does not absorb moisture. The light was now known as the Magnesium. Its intense power and brilliancy attracted attention, and efforts were made to bring it into general use, but the expense of procuring pure oxygen proved an insurmountable obstacle. Oxygen cost $300 per 1,000 cubic feet, and at this price the light was of course too expensive for general use. Except for light-houses on important points of the coast, for illuminations on particular occasions, and for theatrical purposes, the new light was never used.

As it was found that the new light could never come into general use until some cheaper process of manufacturing oxygen gas was discovered, chemists turned their attention to this point, with what success will be seen.

MANUFACTURE OF OXYGEN GAS.

There are several modes by which oxygen can be obtained, the one hitherto in vogue being by the decomposition of chlorate of potash, the chemical formula of which is Cl plus O5 plus KO. By this method six equivalents of oxygen are obtained, five from the acid and one from the alkali, but the cost of manufacture is enormous, being about $300 for 1,000 cubic feet. Of course at this price oxygen could be used only on a very limited scale. In January, 1866, a French chemist, M. TESSIE DU MOTAY, while experimenting in the glass works of M. M. MARICHAL DE METZ, discovered that oxygen could be obtained from manganate of soda (a very cheap article) in unlimited quantities. The importance of his discovery was acknowledged, and some French capitalists at once entered into negotiations with the discoverer for the manufacture of the gas on a large scale. Extensive works were erected at Pontin, and it was found that the amount of oxygen gas that could be produced by the new method was even greater than M. DU MOTAY had calculated on. This method, as explained to the writer by Dr. WILKINSON, of the New-York Free Academy, who has himself constructed a small apparatus for the manufacture of the gas, is as follows:

A quantity of manganate of soda (Mn plus O3 plus Na O) is placed in an iron retort, beneath which a brisk fire is kept burning. Through the retort steam superheated to 500 or 600 degrees is passed. The hydrogen of the steam forms with the soda a hydrate of soda, while the oxygen goes to form a sesquioxyde of manganese. The steam which has passed through the retort now contains a quantity of free oxygen, liberated from the manganate of soda, and as the steam is condensed, the oxygen escapes and is collected in proper receivers. So soon as the steam ceases to give off oxygen the supply of steam is stopped, and atmospheric air is let into the retort. The contents of the retort then absorb oxygen from the air, and this oxygen is again washed out of it, as it were, by the steam. Thus steam and atmospheric air are alternately passed through the retort, and thus a supply of oxygen is obtained at a cost, as is estimated, of $20 per 1,000 cubic feet. From experiments made at Pontin, it was found that from two tons of manganate of soda can be obtained in twenty-four hours, 3,000 cubic feet of the gas.

It will be seen that the process of manufacture above described is simple in the extreme. So long as the fires are kept up and the alternate supply of steam and atmospheric air is maintained, oxygen will continue to be given off. The manganate of soda has been used for eighteen months at a time, without its power being in any way impaired; but, even if it required renewing every year, its cost is so trifling that the renewal would add scarcely anything to the expense of manufacturing the gas.

Here, then, is a discovery which promises not only to be of great importance in enabling us to obtain a cheaper and better light than has ever been in use before, but will also be available for other purposes, among which may be enumerated the manufacture of glass and steel, both of which processes require an intense heat and a large supply of oxygen, and the smelting of ores.

It may also be mentioned, in this connection, that the manganate of soda is found to possess powerful bleaching qualities, due, of course, to the large quantity of oxygen it contains, and that it does not, like chlorine, injure the fabric of the article immersed in it. It can be obtained in unlimited quantities at a very trifling expense.

OPERATION OF THE MAGNESIUM LIGHT.

A stream of oxygen and one of ordinary coal gas (carburetted hydrogen) are permitted to mingle in a small chamber, just beneath the burner. From this chamber the combined gases pass through four small orifices, and impinge upon a pencil of oxide of magnesium. This pencil instantly becomes of a white heat, and casts a light as brilliant, almost, as that of the sun. There is no flame, consequently the light cannot flicker, nor can it be put out. The highest wind can have no effect upon it. Its advantage over all other lights, even setting aside its intense brilliancy, is at once evident. Compositors and those who have to work by gaslight, will appreciate the fact that the magnesium light is perfectly steady, and that it may be used near an open door or window even when a gale is blowing, without being in any way affected thereby.

But it possesses still another advantage, which the ladies will fully appreciate. It is well known that nearly all colors lose a portion of their brilliancy when exhibited in any of the ordinary artificial lights, but beneath the magnesium light the most delicate shades of purple, blue and green that the art of the dyer has ever produced, appear as brilliant as in the full light of day. Thus in a ball room lit up with the magnesium light, our belles can wear any colors they may please without fear of their losing any of their effect.

The light has also been used for photographic purposes, and has been found to answer all the requirements. By its aid a photograph of the interior of one of the apartments in the great pyramid was taken some time ago by a party of English travelers.

But there is still another advantage possessed by this light, which is of great importance in a sanitary point of view. Those who have paid any attention to the subject know how rapidly the ordinary gas lights poison the air of a room, abstracting its oxygen and converting it into carbonic acid. It is estimated that a five feet burner gives off about five feet of carbonic acid in twenty-four hours. The magnesium light abstracts no oxygen from the air, and gives off but two feet of carbonic acid in twenty-four hours.

From the experiments made in Paris it is estimated that the cost of the magnesium light will be from thirty to forty per cent. less than the ordinary gas light.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF THE NEW LIGHT.

As already stated, the new light has been introduced here on a small scale, and it is now proposed to introduce it to general use, and a party of wealthy capitalists have already commenced the construction of the necessary works for the manufacture of oxygen gas on a large scale. It is believed that they will be able to produce twenty thousand cubic feet of the gas every twenty-four hours, and of course by the extension of their works as much more as may be desired. The light was exhibited at the L'Exposition Universelle. It attracted the notice of the Emperor and Baron HAUSSMAN, and orders were given to light up with it the Tuileries and the Hotel de Ville. M. SCHWARTZWENBER, one of the gentlemen employed in arranging the apparatus in the Tuileries and the Hotel de Ville, is now in this country, and will give the Company the advantage of his practical knowledge and experience. The services of the eminent chemist, Dr. DOREMUS, have also been secured by the Company.

Of course, if the new light is to come into general use for the illumination of our streets, stores and public and private buildings, mains for the conveyance of oxygen gas will have to be laid by the side of those now conveying coal gas, and an additional set of pipes for conducting the oxygen to the burners will have to be used. Whether or not our existing gas companies will take the matter in hand, purchase the oxygen gas from the manufacturers and sell it to the consumers in combination with their coal gas, or how the matter will be arranged is, for the present, uncertain.

WOMEN'S NAMES.

If any one thing more than another tends to show the way that the thoughts of most women go, consciously, or unconsciously, it is the small value that they usually attach to their maiden names. Polly Hopkins changes the "Polly" part of her name into "Mollie"—as to the "Hopkins" part of it, she consoles herself with the idea that it won't stick to her very long; and that she may soon get a much nicer name in exchange. She could not possibly support the idea of being called Mollie Hopkins for the term of her natural life. How sweetly she says to young Paul Fane: "Call me Mollie—don't call me Miss Hopkins!" and how often, when she takes out her tiny rosewood desk to answer those long girlish letters of eight pages and crossed,—which the Mollie Hopkinses are always getting and are always carrying in their jaunty apron pockets, with just a corner peeping out temptingly,—does she sit scrawling idly, on stray bits of paper, after this wise: "Mollie Hopkins," "Paul Fane,"—then, by a natural sequence follows: Mollie Fane—just to see how it looks, you know! It certainly does look very pretty; very much prettier than Mollie Hopkins—and then—Mrs. Paul Fane! That sounds grand! She imagines that name on her cards! and just then awakening to a perception of what she is doing—namely, counting her chickens before they are hatched, she blushes, though there is nobody near to see; and tears the paper up into little bits!

But this is just the thing that women are doing every day. They are always thinking how much nicer a certain man's name is than their own. As long as this chronic indifference to their own last names continues—as long as the most of them keep thinking that the men's names are nicer than theirs—as long as they are so willing to merge their own identity in that of some man, they ought n't to make so much noise about their rights. What's the matter with these unfortunate family names of theirs that they are so ashamed of them—that they want to keep them out of sight so much—that they prefer to be called by their first names and to sign only their first names to all their letters—mark them on their handkerchiefs—append them to gushing effusions, called poetry, which they sometimes write? All these things go to show what little importance they attach to their last names, because they do not expect to retain them. They consider that Fannie, or Jennie, or Mollie quite embodies their individuality, and the last name is entirely superfluous.

Then, again, what pets young ladies, and even elderly ladies, make of their first names! What transformations these names have to go through to suit the imaginations of the fanciful owners! Plain Susan becomes Susie; stately Frances is changed into FANNY, and Fanny again into Fannie; magnificent Elizabeth loses her dignity in Bessie or Lizzie; musical Katharine is changed into romping Kate. No matter how grand, or musical, or full of significance be the name, they will find a means to familiarize it—bring it down and complete the incongruity by Frenchifying it with an ie, instead of using a good plain English y. This mania among girls for Frenchifying their names, has reached the culminating point of absurdity. Every woman now is a Mollie, a Hattie, a Carrie, a Nannie, or a Sallie, or something else with an ie at the end of it. This is all in very bad taste, considering that they are Americans and not French women. But there is one thing they ought to know—French women never allow themselves to be familiarly designated by nicknames or pet names, except in the circle of their relatives and intimate friends. Besides, what is proper in the way of names for a French girl is not proper for an American girl. The structure of the French language is such that women's names mostly end in it with ie—Marie or Amelie or Emilie is a full French name, just as Mary or Amelia or Emily is an English, and corresponds to these names. French people would doubtless substitute some familiar diminutive, such as "Mimi" for Marie, and so on, to be used among intimate friends, but would never think of printing these diminutives on visiting cards or marking them on handkerchiefs, or signing them to any letters except those written to relatives and very intimate friends. And when you change Mary into Molly and Amelia into Milly, and Emily into Emmy, and further render yourselves absurd by spelling them with an ie, you are doing a foolish thing. Your language is just as good as any other language; your names are as pretty in that language as in any other; and too great partiality for fanciful diminutives and an indiscriminate use of them, is in bad taste. When Miss Johnson has the moral courage to write herself down plain Martha Johnson, instead of Mattie Johnson, I am more inclined to believe that she has a good share of self-respect—in short, that she's a sensible girl with no nonsense about her, and that she will be able

GENERAL.

A San Francisco dispatch says that a terrible earthquake occurred at Colima, Mexico, on the 20th of December. The volcano of Colima, thirty miles from the city, had been in a state of eruption for several days, causing a rumbling and shaking of the earth for many miles around. On the 20th, at Colima, the earthquake commenced by gentle rockings, which increased in violence gradually, throwing down numerous buildings, and doing great damage to property generally. Several persons were killed by falling walls. In the country the shock was still more severe. The earth opened, water courses were changed, hills were leveled, and there was a general upheaval. The Cathedral of Manzanillo was shaken to its foundations, and hotels and dwellings were entirely demolished. Fifteen or twenty persons were killed in Manzanillo by the falling of the walls of a hotel and a storehouse.

The remains of Hon. JOHN MINOR BOTTS arrived in Richmond yesterday, and were conveyed to the Senate Chamber, where they lay in State. In the evening a meeting of citizens was held, when eulogies were spoken by Gov. WELLES and Hon. L. H. CHANDLER, and appropriate resolutions were adopted.

A call is issued by the Board of Trade of Buffalo for a meeting of citizens to-morrow morning to consider what shall be done to protect the interest of our canals, and to secure concert of action in regard to the measures that shall be determined on.

Lieut.-Col. GEORGE POMEROY, a paymaster of the army, died at Omaha on the 1st inst. Col. POMEROY entered the volunteer service in 1861, in the First Minnesota Volunteers, and served with distinction throughout the Peninsula and Maryland campaigns. At Antietam he was carried from the field severely wounded. Conspicuous gallantry won for him promotion from the rank of Second Lieutenant to that of Lieutenant-Colonel. The latter commission he declined in favor of one as Additional Paymaster United States Army. In 1866 he was appointed in the Pay Department of the Regular Army.

Gen. GRANT is expected to attend the annual meeting of the Board of Managers of the Peabody Educational Fund, which is to take place in Baltimore on the 20th inst. A public reception is to be tendered him by the citizens.

Representatives from a band of 400 Comanche Indians have arrived at Fort Bascom, desiring to surrender to the United States authorities. They were informed that they could only surrender at Fort Cobb, the object being to get them where they would be under the eye of Gen. SHERIDAN.

The father of King KAMEHAMEHA, of the Sandwich Islands, was buried with great pomp on the 22d of December. Some sailors and marines from the United States steamer Ossipee were in the procession. A flourishing slave trade is reported to be carried on between the Micronesian Islands and the south coast of Africa. A heavily armed brig, with a well-disciplined crew of Englishmen, Americans and Manilla-men, is cruising in the vicinity of the Micronesian Islands, flying either the British or American flag, as occasion requires. Merchant vessels are notified to be on the watch for her.

Advices from Hayti give additional particulars of the recent campaign of SALNAVE in the Southern Peninsula. He captured the City of Miragoane, but was driven out by the rebels. He retook the city, and destroyed a portion of it. He then captured six other towns on the sea coast, the inhabitants aiding him in driving out the rebels. SALNAVE returned to Port-au-Prince, and it is believed that his campaign will lead to the surrender of Jacmel and Jeremie. It is reported that a cargo of arms and ammunition shipped from Boston to the rebels had reached their destination. The Government monopoly of the coffee trade was removed on the 20th of December, and opened to competition under certain restrictions.

A Foolish Scheme.

There is before Congress a joint resolution providing that the United States may establish a protectorate over the islands in the Caribbean Sea, (Hayti and St. Domingo being specially mentioned,) for the purpose of enabling them to establish stable republican forms of Government against any and all influences foreign to them, or whenever the people of said islands may request the same.

Now, we suppose that Congress knows that there is no trouble whatever about foreign intervention in Hayti or St. Domingo, and that it is not "foreign influences" that prevent them establishing stable republican Governments. Their troubles are internal. The revolution and anarchy that prevail in Hayti and St. Domingo come from their own people, and from the struggles of their own ambitious leaders. In Hayti there has been no foreign interference, and the last attempt at foreign interference in St. Domingo was eight years ago, when Spain made an effort to reassert her authority. Yet, during the last ten years, there has been revolution after revolution in Hayti, and the war which has raged throughout the country for the last two years has now brought it into an almost hopeless state of anarchy. Neither the Empire of SOULOUQUE, the Republic of GEFFRARD, nor the Administration of SALNAVE, has been able to hold together, and it is impossible to guess what may turn up after they get exhausted with the present war. In the Republic of St. Domingo also, there seems to be no end to the raging squabbles, and hardly any prospect of assured republican stability.

Now, if Congress wishes to assist these two unhappy peoples, it is not from foreign interference they need to be saved, but from themselves. We must send an army and navy to put down the insurrections and revolutions, to establish Government, and to preserve order. We must crush out the rebels, if we can discover which party are the rebels. We must uphold the genuine Government, if we can find out the genuine one. And, if we were to try this, for example, in the case of Hayti, we should be very sure to find all Hayti against us. We should have to fight all the factions, and the whole population—fight them on the seaboard, fight them in the mountains—fight the worst savages outside of Africa, in the most difficult country outside of Abyssinia. We suppose we could do it. The American people stick at nothing, and Congress is afraid of nothing. But after it is done,—what? Why, a ruined island more utterly ruined than it is now, and a nation of African savages more hopelessly savage than ever. We should find a couple of hundred millions added to our own debt, and a good deal less than nothing to show for it.

But we are told that the resolution introduced to Congress also "squints very strongly at Cuba." The Cuban insurrectionists have asked the assistance of this country, and it is thought we might do them the small service of guaranteeing them against foreign interference, and securing them a "stable republican Government." Why not? It might be a small service, but it would be a good deal bigger fight than some folks imagine. It would need an army of at least fifty thousand men,—to say nothing of the navy,—even if we had only Spain to fight; and it would cost us at least five hundred millions,—to say nothing of shoddy and plundering. And if, after all, we were to save the people of Cuba from foreign interference, we might by no means be able to give them a "stable republican Government." It might not be so easy to make stable republicans out of the African and Chinese inhabitants,—to say nothing of the Creoles and Spaniards.

The fact is, there is no necessity for Americans going to Hayti, or Cuba, or Crete, to find all the work they can possibly do in behalf of republican institutions. There has fearful corruption grown up in our own Republic, which it will require more effort to keep from ruining us than were required in the seven labors of Hercules. There is a stupendous debt crushing the country, which we can only pay off justly by stupendous effort, and stupendous honesty. There is a vast amount of poverty, suffering and helplessness among our laboring classes, which is working toward the degradation of the country, and must be remedied by vast effort if we would save our Republic from ruin. If Congress can furnish us any assistance in either of these directions it will receive our deep gratitude; but until it is able to do something in the way of remedying such evils, it would be well to let alone Hayti and Cuba, where we cannot possibly do any good.

Labor Reform—The Boston Convention.

A Labor Reform Convention is to be held in Boston on the 26th of this month for the discussion of what is called the "Labor Question." The subject is one of great and growing importance, and if the discussions are of the right kind,—if they are dispassionate and practical,—the Convention cannot fail to do great good.

But it seems to be under the direction of WENDELL PHILLIPS, S. S. FOSTER, and other professional agitators who avowedly take up this question now because "slavery has been abolished" and "equal suffrage seems to be secured,"—in other words, only because the other topics which have hitherto engaged their rhetorical attention have ceased to be available. We very much doubt the utility of such "discussions," as they are likely to bring to the subject of labor. They know but little about it, and they are not half as likely to tell what they know, as what they feel, or pretend to feel.

No one can fail to see that there is now,—as there has always been,—though now it is more general and pressing perhaps than ever before,—a sharp contest going on between Capital and Labor, for a readjustment of their respective shares of the wealth produced by their joint employment. The problem is one of the most difficult, as it is one of the most important, that can engage the attention and enlist the efforts of political economists. It can only be properly treated by men of knowledge, and of reflection. It is not a question for passion or sentiment,—nor can either of those faculties contribute in the least to its just solution.

But the men who are likely to have this Convention in charge are preeminently men of passion, and of little else. They have won all their triumphs in the past by appeals to passion,—to the feelings rather than the judgment,—and by arousing and directing the passions of the people against the wrongs they have arraigned. And naturally they will be inclined to treat the labor question in the same way. The drift of their discussions of it will probably lie in denunciations of the tyranny of capital, and in exhortations to all engaged in labor to combine for its overthrow.

That anything but mischief can come from such a method of treating the matter is out of the question. Very much of the evil connected with the subject, and nearly all the difficulty of its adjustment, has been due to the bitterness of feeling thus engendered. We should be very sorry to see this difficulty still further increased by the organization of such a crusade as the Boston reformers seem most likely to set on foot. We may be mistaken as to the course they are likely to take in the coming Convention. We hope we are, for we can conceive of none more likely to injure the cause that Convention is intended to aid.

The Naval Appropriations and Mr. Washburne.

The point made by Mr. BROOKS, the other day, in reply to Mr. WASHBURNE, strikes us as neither quite appropriate nor worthy of the former gentleman's doctrines of "retrenchment and reform." Mr. WASHBURNE having procured the Naval bill to be made the special order for Monday, in a slight discussion that arose thereon, Mr. BROOKS retorted upon him that "a member might take up the time of the House in bellowing about economy, and thus waste forty times the amount attempted to be saved."

This is one of those general aspersions which are usually reserved for men of less than Mr. BROOKS' calibre to employ in the room of argument or fact. That it is peculiarly unjust in Mr. WASHBURNE'S case, we need hardly argue. Without holding anybody up as infallible on the subject of appropriations, it is yet simple justice to say of Mr. WASHBURNE that no more persistent advocate of real, not pretended, economy, sits in either House. He makes mistakes, probably, like most other people, but the many schemes of public plunder in whose defeat he has led, and the many loose estimates of department expenditure which he has been largely instrumental in having cut down, during many years, are not to be dismissed by a cheap sneer. If it has been said of Mr. WASHBURNE that "economy is his hobby," we may add that it could be wished the foibles of some other members were as unobjectionable. It is rather the fashion to speak slightingly of a legislator's "getting up a reputation for economy;" but the satirists would do well to reflect that a stable reputation of that sort is not "got up" without incurring the powerful and deadly enmity of every "clique," "ring," corporation and individual, whose raid upon the public purse any honest legislator defeats, and who often combine to ruin him—an event which, in that case, sooner or later, they usually accomplish.

In his elaborate speech the other day, (which drew a compliment from Mr. BROOKS' colleague, Mr. WOOD,) Mr. WASHBURNE traversed the whole ground of the year's appropriations—involving, of course, matters of weeks of Congressional action. This subject, we repeat, he reviewed in an hour or two, with such authority of opinion, derived from investigation, as his position on the Appropriation Committee gave him, and demonstrated the probable savings—amounting to many millions—which could be made. Surely this cannot be what Mr. BROOKS calls "bellowing about economy," or so "taking up the time of the House as to waste forty times the amount attempted to be saved;" or, if it be, then with a very little figuring, one may calculate the precious value of time to our national legislators.

We do not design to indorse every economy that Mr. WASHBURNE proposes, because he proposes it, or to ask for him, even on his specialty of retrenchment, a different canon of criticism from that applied to other members; but we may make this the occasion for saying that it would be well for Congressmen at the outset to discard old prejudices, and to be prepared to welcome and treat fairly every proposition claiming to be one of economy—whether private or public motive seem to instigate it, and in whatsoever political party it originates.

As to this special measure—the Naval Appropriation bill—the bill for 1869–1870 sets apart, in round numbers, two millions less than that of the year preceding. That was thought to be at the lowest notch of economy, but by dint of some reductions in the force of the navy and the marine corps, and in the appropriations for navy-yards, and "for the preservation of vessels," the last year's total is brought down about twelve per cent. Some doubt may hang over the reduction of the marine corps, which is already a very tidy little establishment, at best, and more regarding the "preservation of vessels," which is a matter already too much neglected, so that we fear some vessels are past praying for. However, perhaps some odd hundreds of thousands, for other matters, may have been included in this last item—which in that case may be safely cut out.

However, the noteworthy matter is that the Naval Appropriation bill is the first of the grand series for the year, and as such it ought to be met with careful scrutiny, and the disposition to do all that is needed—but no more. Last year, the Department suddenly (indeed with almost indecorous precipitation) cut down its own estimates nearly twenty millions—or, about a half—within a few weeks of rendering them. Such a saving cannot be repeated this year; but that is no reason why "bellowing about economy" may not do some good, if done in the right way.

The Lady Reformers at Fault.

The latest combination among the lady reformers would be rather comical if it were not unfortunate. The Sorosis, who meet for pleasure, the "Revolutionists," headed by Miss ANTHONY, who demand the right of suffrage, and the workingwomen who beg for work, have combined in one association—a sort of coöperative society, in which each party pursues its distinct object, and the whole imagine that they are acting in concert. But the dear creatures are as impractical as ever. At the last meeting at Cooper Institute the delegate from Sorosis, Miss "SHIRLEY DARE," assured the workingwomen of the sympathy of her society, and suggested the idea of aiding the workingwomen of New-York by a weekly contribution of five cents—the lady did not say as much, but it is inferred that she meant that the Sorosis Club should make the donation. Miss ANTHONY proposed giving present employment to idle workingwomen by sending them into Wall-street and Fifth-avenue to solicit signatures to the petition for woman suffrage! Miss ANTHONY evidently does not consider this the most remunerative employment obtainable, for she suggested that this might lead to something better, and that the ladies thus employed "might fall into something." Mrs. ROSE, a representative of the workingwomen, said some very sensible things of workingwomen's difficulties and necessities, but she grew impractical when she advanced a plan for their relief. She suggested the novel idea of establishing the independence of the workingwomen by first starting them in the world as beggars. She proposed a grand coöperative society, but as the workingwomen have none of the necessary funds, Mrs. ROSE suggested that a committee be invited to wait upon Messrs. BELLOWS, BEECHER, CHAPIN, CHEEVER, &c., and so on through the whole alphabet of popular lecturers, asking each one to devote a night's labor to help the funds of the Union. This these gentlemen would doubtless very willingly do, but would the workingwomen as willingly accept? Are the funds for the establishment of the suggested banks and insurance offices to be raised in the same way? We fear that Treasurer SPINNER, gallant and generous as he is, could hardly be tempted to receive orders on even Lecturers GOUGH, or CURTIS, or NASBY, for their large nightly receipts, as Government securities for a Female National Bank; and those wise and thrifty and considerate husbands who secure insurance policies on their lives, that their widows and orphans may not be reduced to the terrible straits of the poor workingwomen, are so particular as to the companies in which they invest, that the most brilliant of arguments would induce but few to take risks in establishments thus secured.

We expressed the idea some months ago, that the Woman's Rights movement was more wisely directed now than formerly; but we fear that the evidences which led to that conclusion were unreliable, and that our earnest wish was father to the gratifying belief. The ladies are, unfortunately, getting into the clouds again. When the actual workingwomen ceased to meet and instruct and advise each other by comparing notes and experiences as to the nature and remuneration of their various kinds and grades of work, the Workingwomen's Association began to lose in influence and interest, until we are not surprised to learn that not more than a dozen actual laborers were among its audience of twenty persons at the Cooper Institute on the 8th inst. This meeting will probably prove the last, and the end of a movement which ought to have attracted the active sympathy of all classes of women and men in the City. Had the Association been directed and composed of the real workers, and the discussions of the fancied rights of women been substituted by plain, unvarnished tales of real wrongs and actual experience, the movement would have touched the heart of the great City; and a powerful influence would have been brought to bear upon employers and employés which would have corrected, as far as it is possible for anything outside of purely commercial considerations to affect, the abuses complained of, and which undoubtedly exist.

But the relief to the present class of female artisans cannot be great. The truth is, as we have urged before, that there is no systematizing and regulating the work and wages of persons who are not workers, and whose labor does not command wages. The wages of artisans will always be in accordance with their skill and rapidity. No other considerations or combinations or unions can increase the value of work, any more than they can change the standard value of the gold dollar. The skilled artisan will always be more valuable to his employer and will command more wages than the apprentice; he will make more money if paid according to the quantity and quality of his work than the ignorant and unskillful laborer. Women in this country are not skilled artisans; they do not learn trades, and naturally they do not earn good wages. Mrs. ROSE, at the meeting in question, asked why women in America may not be watchmakers, since they have a delicate touch. The delicate touch would avail little without the other requisite training. The women of this country have soft voices, and many of them sing well, and all sing a little; but only those are good singers who have been educated through an apprenticeship longer and harder than any required to learn telegraphing or type-setting.

The fact is that our lady reformers have begun at the wrong end. They must go back and learn before they can perform; and they must learn thoroughly if they would earn largely. They cannot compete with skilled artisans or educated professionals of the other sex, even at inferior wages, if they are inferior in knowledge. The true way is to begin at the beginning and learn the trades best suited to them. The best way to reform the matter altogether is to encourage the apprenticing of girls as well as boys to trades; and until parents break through old and foolish prejudices, and consider this most important duty to their daughters in precisely the same way that they look and act upon the same duty to their sons, and educate sons and daughters alike to support themselves, the present evils and abuses must continue to exist. In the rapidly increasing districts of the North-west, where the women are so largely in excess of the men and where they must ultimately become self-supporting, it is a paramount duty of every parent to see that his daughters as well as his sons are taught useful and practical knowledge as well as the accomplishments. In this practical age it is far better that the majority of young women should know how to handle type than to thump guitars; better to run a folding-machine or feed a printing press than to run even a sewing-machine; the skill which can make a paper box is more valuable, though less beautiful, than a knowledge of embroidery; and it is far more profitable to finger the brass key of the telegraph instrument than the ivory ones of the piano.

The Ballot in England.

The recent address of Mr. JOHN BRIGHT to his constituents at Birmingham, on his re-election after vacating his seat in Parliament, on becoming a member of the new Gladstone Cabinet, has even more than the usual interest to Americans which generally attaches to his speeches. The hitherto simple representative of a large class of the English people, has now spoken for the first time in the double capacity as such representative, and as a responsible member of the English Government. As the Ministry had met but once, there was no expectation that Mr. BRIGHT would indicate the policy of the Government any further than this policy had been disclosed in the canvass of the general election, which had just brought them into power. At the same time, there was no departure from his usual frankness in promulgating his own liberal views, and it appears from this speech that another great step in political reform, of which Mr. BRIGHT has been the champion—a further Americanizing of British institutions by introducing the ballot—to which Mr. GLADSTONE and the Liberal Party were not committed in the election, will be among the measures to be introduced by the new Government.

Mr. BRIGHT'S declarations on this point seem, indeed, quite conclusive, for he said:

"I am very glad to tell you that when I went up to London last week, I found, I was going to say almost nobody professing to be a Liberal, on the Liberal side of the House of Commons, who was not in favor of the ballot. Those who had previously been in its favor had been strongly confirmed in their views by recent transactions, and some important persons who heretofore have withheld their countenance from it, now admit with the greatest freedom, that what they have seen of late has entirely changed their opinion, and they believe with our present wide suffrage—I don't know why it should be just more in one case than in the other—the adoption of the ballot is not only proper, but inevitable."

This statement shows a very rapid change in public opinion and a new advance by the Liberal Party. The late English elections have, however, been so disgraceful, so characterized by drunkenness and mob violence, stimulated in most instances by the money of the candidates, expended through scores of agents for bribing electors, that all parties and classes are so heartily ashamed of these exhibitions that the ballot is now very generally accepted as the only remedy.

Of all the reforms advocated by Mr. BRIGHT, the ballot has in years past subjected him to more partisan rancor and animosity than any other. Before the election the Liberals were a great ways apparently from adopting it. The proposal has been met with ridicule and hatred by the higher classes, while the lower, some from apprehensions that no one would pay them for their votes when the means of knowing how they voted had disappeared, and others, because of the reputed unmanliness of withholding one's political opinions and preferences, have been divided on the question, and both friends and opponents have thought its introduction was, if not uncertain, remote. It seems now, however, to be coming much sooner than either expected, and it is quite certain that the new Reform bill can effect no radical change in the constitution of the House of Commons, unless the ballot is introduced. Whether even this will transfer political power from the aristocratic or wealthy classes, so as to be under the direction of the great body of the people, as in this country, may be doubtful, but no other known device would be so likely to accomplish the result.

It appears, therefore, that the popular leader, instead of receding from his aggressive measures against the British Constitution—and that is the way they have been characterized—as many predicted would be the case on his becoming a member of the Government, is really finding the field enlarging, and his opportunities greater for carrying forward these aggressions.

TOWN TOPICS.

Cooperation in a small way may be profitably engaged in by two or more families. For instance, the great fish market of this City is near Fulton Ferry. During mild and thawing weather excellent fish of various kinds can be purchased at very low prices. Wholesale dealers are not allowed to sell less than ten pounds in a single lot. Therefore, if two families unite to purchase a supply, they can obtain fish at 4c.@5c. per pound, and of the same quality as would cost them at the retailers as much as 10c.@15c. per pound. In cold and freezing weather the prices of fish are unusually firm, and the rates range higher than those we have quoted as ruling in weather as mild as that with which we have been favored during the past week. What is true of fish is also true concerning poultry. By purchasing a box of forty or more pounds, it can be obtained at 12c.@14c., and good poultry may be preserved from fifteen to twenty days, by simply hanging it in a cellar or any room where no fire is required.

West-street, from Pier No. 1 to Pier No. 45, a distance of about two miles, is one of the narrowest and filthiest streets of this City—perhaps of the world. Considering the enormous traffic of this thoroughfare and the heavy business all along the piers on the Hudson River, West-street ought to be widened at least one hundred feet beyond its existing width. This might be done by extending the piers and substantially flooring over the spaces between the slips. Besides a widened carriage-way, there should be a clear and unobstructed sidewalk on both sides of the street—a convenience which would be highly appreciated by the busy throng who now run the gauntlet of hand-carts, mud, wheelbarrows, garbage, trucks, danger, horse-cars, scavengers and unmitigated distress.

One session in the week (Wednesday's) was until recently found sufficient by the Board of Police Commissioners to hear all the complaints of Captains and citizens made against members of the Police Force. But now, in view of the increasing labors of the Board of this character, it has been agreed to meet twice per week—on Wednesdays and Fridays. Should the Police continue in moral retrogression for another year or so, they will secure exclusive possession of the Commissioners, while the latter will enjoy the privilege of holding perpetual Court for the trial of law-breaking policemen.

The ordinance of the Board of Health, requiring the removal of the slaughter-houses to a point north of Fortieth-street, has been put into effect. The butchers have made a sturdy resistance to this movement, fighting it in the Courts and elsewhere. But the necessity of the measure, for sanitary reasons, has been too great to enable a single calling to oppose it effectually. True, the interests of a respectable and industrious class of citizens are temporarily unpleasantly affected by this abatement of a great nuisance in the very heart of the City,—but the sufferers will soon rally from their brief difficulties. The general public will be at once greatly benefited by the change, and not very remotely the butchers themselves will be the gainers.

The East River Improvement Association have sent us a copy of a petition to Congress asking an appropriation for the removal of the rocks at Hell Gate. Citizens who will interest themselves in circulating these petitions for signatures are requested to call or send for copies at the office, No. 11 Pine-street. It is especially desired that gentlemen who reside out of, and who do business in New-York, should interest themselves in this matter. Petitions should be sent to Congress immediately, in the name of 100,000 citizens who almost daily have person or property exposed to the dangers of the passage.

In view of the disgraceful election frauds which have recently been perpetrated, the Union League Club are circulating a petition to Congress for signatures asking an amendment of the Naturalization laws. The points urged are to restrict the power of conferring citizenship to the United States Courts; to require from a person desiring citizenship the record in the Courts of his declaration of intentions; to provide for the publication of the names and residences of applicants for citizenship, and the punishment for forgery or fraud connected with the business as a felony, and suggesting the propriety of a general act in which the whole law bearing upon the subject shall be embodied and clearly expressed.

The only obstacle to the general use of the magnesium light has been the great expense attending the manufacture of oxygen gas,—the great supporter of combustion. This difficulty, however, has now been overcome, and the gas can be produced by a very simple process at a cost of $20 per 1,000 cubic feet. Oxygen gas was formerly obtained by the decomposition of chlorate of potash—a most expensive article—and cost $300 per 1,000 cubic feet. The magnesium light is found to possess sixteen times as much illuminating power as the best coal gas, and consequently is twenty times as brilliant as any coal gas yet manufactured in this City for general consumption. The new light also possesses several other advantages. It is from thirty to forty per cent. cheaper than coal gas; it does not flicker, and cannot be blown out; it gives off very little carbonic acid, and beneath its rays the most delicate shades of color lose none of their brilliancy or beauty. The public will rejoice at the prospect of superseding our dim, sickly, flickering gas-lights by the brilliant magnesium.

A new coöperative store for the sale of groceries is to be established in the Fourth Ward by well-known and trustworthy parties, who believe that the dense population of that part of the City will make the enterprise a success. A similar establishment, which was started two years ago in an up-town neighborhood, failed in consequence of the superior strength of its competitors and the scanty population in its vicinity. If, under the favorable auspices which are connected with it, this Fourth Ward store shall succeed, we shall find groceries on this plan all about the City. Properly conducted, these establishments will be a great blessing to the poor and middling classes.

A correspondent suggests a plan which is not unworthy of consideration for thoroughfares, à la HAUSMANN, between the east and west sides of the City, below Fourteenth-street, in this manner: Continue New Bowery by cutting a street diagonally through the Sixth and Fourteenth Wards, beginning at Pell-street and crossing Broadway at Bleecker-street; thence diagonally cutting through Washington-square, at an angle running from Fourth to Eighth-street; thence across into Greenwich-avenue. On the west side, start from the foot of Chambers-street, diagonally, intersecting Broadway at Canal-street; thence across the Bowery at an angle drawn to Houston-street; thence crossing by an angle which would strike Tompkins-square at Sixth-street and through to Eighth-street; thence to foot of Fourteenth-street. Such streets certainly would let daylight into the most crowded portion of the City, and afford a direct and convenient thoroughfare, which is greatly needed. The expense would not be so very great, considering the character and value of the property along the proposed route; and by running the streets diagonally across two of the largest of the City Parks, a large item of the cost would be saved without diminishing their usefulness as open places or "lungs" to the neighborhood.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Our hanging bridges will become as famous as the old "hanging gardens" of Babylon. The Highland Suspension Bridge, from Anthony's Nose on the east, to Fort Clinton on the west of the Hudson, over forty miles from New-York, will have nearly double the span of the Niagara bridge below the Falls, and about the length of our meditated highway across the East River—that is, about 1,600 feet. The Hudson bridge has more advantages of site, in the shores on either side, which are over 150 feet high. Its height above the water will be 150 feet exceeding that of our own bridge by twenty feet. The cost is estimated at from three and a half to four millions, a figure which our cities will be likely to look on with envy, though it will grow, at the usual rate of "arithmetical progression," and, not to be behindhand in anything in the shape of growth, ours will grow too, in all probability.

The Springfield Republican says that it is all very well to praise the telegraph, but it ought to have been mentioned that, if the telegraph is doing great good by expediting the spread of truth, it also does great harm by giving equal celerity to the spread of falsehood. The type, however, were in the same position of perfect equality before the telegraph was invented, when both depended upon the mails. We suspect it will not be found easy to discover any process by which the spread of truth can be hastened and that of falsehood retarded.

It is not inappropriate to the times to suggest a consideration of the fact that of over 25,000 pounds of delayed mail matter on the overland route, one-third was found to consist of franked printed "docs" of various kinds. A large proportion of the bulky Oregon mails, tugged overland through desert and storm, are of the same character. Without mentioning the probability that nearly all the matter thus overloading that costly route has been printed and read in the newspapers long and long before the franked packages can reach their destination, it is worth the thought of Congressmen, who talk so much of "retrenchment," whether the temptation to put the Postal Department to such huge expense would not be happily removed by either abolishing the franking privilege or restricting it to written matter, or at least putting some limit to the tons of waste paper and printer's ink now gorging the full channels of traffic.

It is a statement not a little surprising, but one that is upheld by a study of the late election returns, that the four States of New-York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois contain more than one-third of all the inhabitants of this vast country. The aggregate vote of these States in 1864 was 2,122,916; this year it was 2,470,587—an increase of 16½ per cent. in four years. And if their total population has increased in like proportion with their voters, it now stands at about 14,250,000—or nearly two-fifths of the total estimate for the whole Union, which is 38,000,000.

Savannah news informs us that Mr. STEPHENS has nearly completed the second volume of a work which he calls "The War Among the States." The title is a misnomer, to say no worse of it. The people of the Union gave their blood and treasure through four years to demonstrate that our war was not a quarrel between States, but a war between the Government of the United States and a rebellious people of certain States. In face of the decision which the war has settled, comes Mr. STEPHENS to beg the whole question of the war (for, of course it is begging the question) by assuming the war to have been one between States. Of course, in that case, the road is short for him to draw any conclusions he likes in favor of the legal right of secession, however the power that quelled it may be acknowledged and respected.

The men of New-Amsterdam would not know our New-York if they could see it. They would ask for the Collect Creek that ran nearly across the Peninsula, and also for the several "bubbling runnels" that once meandered on the site of our up-town streets. In less than a century hence, the Harlem River may be as hidden as the Collect—covered over and built upon; for many persons even now are looking forward to such a thing. New-York City will be rushing out, so to speak, to Yonkers and the Bronx, and will want so many bridges that it will decide on having none at all, and the river, of little worth as a transit, will probably become a sewer—and a very good thing too, if it shall be carefully made. It is not pleasant to think of all that picturesque section done away with; but "manifest destiny" will have its way. With the Hell Gate passage cleared, the East River, near Harlem, will very likely be, one day, covered over with dock-yards and ship-yards like those of Liverpool and London.

Wonderful things were discovered the other day at the Baltimore meeting of the owners of the through line from Washington to New-York. They found they could facilitate travel, shorten the time of transit, equip the line with new cars and engines, accommodate freight, accommodate passengers—in short, there is no end to the fine things which they discovered. Query—Why did they not discover these things before? Hitherto we have been told by these same gentlemen that the line was already the ne plus ultra of convenience and luxury. What has set them on this new scent? We shall not take the liberty of guessing what it is, but we may call attention to the Washington dispatch which informs us that the meeting in question "had no reference whatever to Senator SHERMAN'S Air-line Railroad bill," which, curiously enough, was simultaneously introduced into Congress.

Some time since the authorities of Wisconsin offered a reward of twenty-five cents per capita for the killing of wood chucks. The number killed was so enormous as to cause an investigation, which showed that enterprising youth raised the animals for the profit of killing them. This shows the quick adaptability of the "boy of the period" in America. But their compeers, the children of the Departments Du Nord and Pas de Calais, in France, raised last year 2210,000 worth of rabbits, which were sent to London. This was 1,250,000 of the pot-pie order of animal, whose bodies were consumed by Cockney appetites, and whose skins were utilized by hat and glove makers "to Her Majesty." Not a bad speculation for the little French peasants!

The wide-awake Petersburg (Va.) Index has been active lately in the most excellent labor of forwarding "the new movement," which, while it accepts the situation including what it regards as the incubus of negro suffrage, yet pushes for organization and action on the part of the whites, indulging in the perfectly proper hope of bringing Virginia into Federal representation as a Democratic State after all. The policy of many of the Virginians is sullen refusal to recognize the new state of things in any way. The Index throws out this little paragraph apropos of them, under the caption "Old Virginny never tire:"

"If the 'masterly inactivity' of the 'do nothings' whose strength, like that of the Egyptians, is to sit still, should prevail, there is no reason why Virginia should ever tire; for she will never do anything. The most seductive of sins are those of omission. So delusive are they, that their dupes often go the length of making a merit of their shortcomings."

Pride in material achievement is a very excellent thing, but it sometimes leads men into useless and crippling extravagances. The splendid yield of gold and silver from American mines has been a handsome record; but it has cost the extractors of it quite as much, if not more, than it is intrinsically worth. And although it remains in the world, and is doing good service, America is now studying the closer European processes of working, and is trying to find some more economical mode of getting her future supply. So in regard to English railways—and more eminently is it true of them—superb as they are in beauty and solidity of construction, and in efficiency of service, they have proved too costly to be maintained or continued at the same rate. Interest on invested capital, and tremendous expenses of repair and operation make high rates of fare spectators and others." But, owing to an unfortunate question asked by one of the fanciest-tongue crowd, as to the possibility of confiscation of Church property under the changing signs of the times, "the lot" was not successfully bid off. It is rather startling to see buy a matter of such grave import as the spiritual guidance of a people can become a mere matter of bargain and sale, varying in market value according to the physical comfort it can afford the parson. That one parish should be preferable to another is easy enough to understand. But that the possession of them should be attainable for money by "clergymen, speculators and others" is certainly not a cheering sign for the spirituality of the English Church.

Pastor VARTUGYAN, of the Church of Yeni Kapoo, Constantinople, who is now in this City, sends through the TIMES, an appeal to American Christians in behalf of the down-trodden Evangelical Armenians resident in Turkey. A small number of them have already come to this country, and he desires to promote the emigration of others, as the readiest means of relief from their present hopeless destitution, and of forwarding their ultimate welfare. These Armenians number about fifteen thousand, and, as everybody knows, belong to one of the most intelligent, fine-looking and industrious races in the world. They are subjected to great sufferings by the Turks, and are neglected by their fellow Christians of Europe, as our correspondent shows. We understand that Pastor VARTUGYAN has been making inquiries in the Southern States for a proper place for their settlement. There is no doubt that if they could be brought to this country and located on some of the fertile lands of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia or Texas, they could reach any degree of prosperity they might desire, and there is no doubt that they would be a great acquisition to either of these States, as an aid in the development of their resources. We hope that the excellent pastor will find encouragement and assistance in his Christian and humane undertaking.

The Commercial Advertiser last evening printed the following among its special despatches from Washington:

"Considerable interest is manifested respecting Mr. BUTLER'S financial speech, and the galleries of the House present a more animated appearance than usual, by persons desirous of hearing it."

As neither House of Congress was in session yesterday, the "animated appearance" of the galleries was something remarkable.

SUE MURPHY was a loyal woman resident in the South during the rebellion, whose property was destroyed by our army; and she now asks from Congress that the Government may compensate her for her losses. We doubt if the principle can be admitted. Loyal citizens who resided within the enemy's territory during hostilities were subject to the chances of war, and liable to suffer its losses on the same terms as other people. There were loyal citizens in Charleston when GILMORE bombarded it, and in Vicksburg when GRANT bombarded it, and in Petersburg when it was bombarded; and their property was necessarily destroyed, without any distinction between it and other property. GILMORE and GRANT could not point their guns at rebel houses only; they could only direct their guns against a rebel city, and the fact of its being a rebel stronghold justified the use of whatever means were necessary to its reduction. Of course if right and justice require that we should pay the losses of all residents of the South who now claim that they were loyal, then they should be paid without any more ado about it. But we hold that even on such grounds, we are not called upon to pay these claims. We might have done as has been done in the case of other wars; we might have confiscated the property of rebels, and therefrom remunerated loyal people for their losses; but the sentiment of the country was opposed to confiscation, and it was soon evident that nothing could be done in that direction. All we can now do for those who were loyal is to secure them protection, and give them the opportunity of retrieving the losses they suffered by the accident of their being members of a rebellious community.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

The Evangelical Armenians in Turkey.

The Armenians in Turkey are ecclesiastically divided into three classes. The first, which includes a majority of the people, is attached to the ancient Armenian, or, as it is called, the Gregorian Church. The second in order and the second in numerical strength, are the Roman Catholics. The third, which though the smallest in point of numbers, is, in many respects, the most interesting, is known by the appropriate name of Evangelical Armenians.

These last-named have been formed into communities who desire to worship God according to the dictates of a conscience guided by the unerring Word of God, in spirit and in truth. At present they number about fifteen thousand souls. As might have been expected, their separation from the old established Church was not effected without great sacrifices. Some of these sacrifices were made voluntarily by individuals who had learned to distinguish between a religion based upon the truth of the Word of God and one which consisted of cold formalities and imposing ceremonies. But the greatest sacrifices were imposed on them by the hostility of those from whom they separated, and against whose labors they boldly testified. As the word of God grew and prospered many believed and turned to the Lord, so that the losses and sufferings of individuals became those of whole communities.

It is needless to dwell upon all that our brethren in the faith endured for righteousness' sake. But it may be well to mention that they are destitute of buildings for the worship of God. They are too poor to support preachers and ministers. They have no teachers and no schools for the education of their children. They have no hospitals in which the sick can be cared for. No one represents them in the Government, and consequently their rights are not protected. Those who claim to be their protectors have assumed the post without the consent or choice of the people, who have no power to remove them, however they may abuse their authority. Those who occupy such offices use them to advance their own interests, and the wrongs and grievances of those who are dependent on them are left without redress. The cries of these afflicted people are unheeded alike by the Turkish Government and the representatives of foreign Governments. Even the representatives of Protestant Powers exert no influence on behalf of this friendless and oppressed minority.

Until a very recent period they had no place for the burial of their dead in Constantinople, and in many other cities this boon is still denied them. Many of them are homeless and are cut off from all employment by which they might earn food for their families. And when they have reached the close of a life of privation and affliction, their dead bodies often lie for days unburied from the inability of friends and relatives to pay the necessary funeral expenses.

These great sufferings would be alleviated if they knew that in some corner of the world there were any to sympathize with them. But as it is, the thought that they are neglected by all men, and are cast out of the sympathies of the world, and especially of Christians, is one of the bitterest ingredients in the cup of woe. Often when they have confidently appealed to those on whom they have counted as their friends, it has been only to meet with a repulse, and they have gone away disappointed, like thirsty travelers who have strained their last energies to reach a well of promise only to find its waters dried up. If the Christians of America could witness the indifference with which the sufferings of these poor people have been met by those at whose hands compassion, at least, might naturally be expected, they would, like JOHN when he saw the woman drunk with the blood of saints, "wonder with great admiration." Rev. xvii. 6.

When the Roman Catholic missionaries met with their first success among the Armenians, their proselytes suffered all the pains of persecution very much as the Protestants do now. But the attention of the Catholic countries of Europe was turned to the sufferers, and the consequences which they created soon put an end to this. The Catholics encouraged them, but restrained the hostility of their persecutors. Now the Roman Catholic Armenians are among the most prosperous and respected of their race, and occupy the first place for intelligence, civilization, wealth and influence. I am persuaded that had the Christians of Europe and America lent their countenance in any measure to the persecuted flocks of God, it would have been equally effectual, and would have given them a position of great influence and usefulness among their countrymen.

When I am tempted to ask why the sympathy and influence of Protestants have been withheld from us, I am sure that it cannot be because the Protestant faith is less influential than popery. It can only be because American Christians have not been made acquainted with the condition of their brethren, and I am persuaded that it is only necessary that authentic information on the subject should be communicated, in order to secure a cordial and efficient interposition on our behalf. I affectionately and respectfully appeal to American Christians whether now that the truth in the case is submitted to them, they will remain indifferent spectators of our afflictions? or whether after all their generous efforts to send us bibles and missionaries, they will leave their work half done, or leave those who have been converted through their instrumentality to perish on the way between the superstitions, from which we have been delivered, and the glorious liberty which has been presented to our hopes?

If not, then I invite the attention of Christians first of all to a little handful of Armenians who have come to this country in hopes of acquiring a knowledge of the arts and sciences as a means of ministering to the elevation of the race, as well as to the alleviation of their present miseries. In the second place, I ask attention to my cherished purpose and desire to promote the emigration to this favored land of a portion of the sufferers, as the readiest means of relief from their present hopeless destitution and of forwarding their ultimate welfare. If in this connection I may speak of myself, I would say that for the sake of my oppressed and afflicted countrymen I have been willing to hazard my own interests and those of my family. With no security against the loss of all things, I have set out to seek this relief from pressing calamities; on failing in that, to be the first to perish in the temporal ruin which threatens us. Our Naturalization Laws.

Is it yet too late to inquire whether they are leading us? It may have been at one time expedient to offer every inducement to emigration, while the country was in its infancy, and the means of transportation were inadequate and expensive. The facilities of transit at the present day, and the great inducements offered in this country to laborers in Europe, render it certain that we shall continue to have an increasing tide of immigration. Until recently the tide has flowed westward; but with the completion of the Pacific Railroad and the increased facilities of travel offered by the China steamers and sailing vessels, it may be regarded as certain that another current from China and India will flow to our shores.

It may be well, therefore, to inquire whether the time has not arrived for an amendment of our Naturalization laws, and, in fact, whether such amendment has not become essential to the continued well-being of the country, especially when the immigration from the East will consist of an element so heterogeneous as the Chinese.

The evils of extending to naturalized citizens the right of suffrage, are already so glaring, especially in this City, as to need no comment. Why should we not provide against their continuance by so amending these laws as to secure to those who shall, in future avail themselves of their benefit, all the rights and privileges of citizens that are necessary for their security, withholding only that which is needful for guarding ourselves, viz.: the right to vote. It is hoped that this brief notice may have the effect of calling the attention of thoughtful men to the expediency of this measure, before the increase of a new class of population shall raise complications which will render the subject more difficult of treatment.

Party interests are so much at variance with the due consideration of the subject in this City, that the action of discussing it will probably be avoided; but editors throughout the country can render no more essential service than by early directing public opinion in this channel. OIVIS.

NEW-YORK, Jan. 4, 1869.

Legal Tender.

It seems strange that there can be any doubt as to a few plain propositions:

1. That in every country there must necessarily be somewhere a power to declare in what, or with what, men may pay their debts.

2. That in this country there are three places where such a power might reside: a. In the Constitution of the United States itself. b. In Congress. c. In the States; either their Constitutions or their Legislatures.

3. That the Constitution of the United States does not declare in what men may pay their debts.

4. That the Constitution takes away such power from the States,

5. That the power must therefore be in Congress.

Again: Congress may coin money. Hence Congress may, if she choose, debase the currency. Congress may coin eagles out of brass and dollars out of pewter, whose intrinsic value shall be nothing. Such a power must necessarily exist in the legislative body of a Government; unless, by the "organic law," it has been absolutely taken away, and that, too, by unequivocal words.

Has not Congress changed the weight of the dollar; and if they can make one change, cannot they make another? Cannot they reduce its fineness to any extent they please.

If Congress can do this; if they can coin dollars so debased as to be of little intrinsic value; if they can make a round piece of worthless metal legal tender, is it not absurd to argue that they cannot make good the promises of the Government legal tender?

The question is not as to the wisdom but as to the power of doing this.

A written constitution may be a very good thing. And judicial restraint on oppression may often be useful. But if the debtors of the country, having trusted to the power of Congress to declare in what they may pay their debts, are now lying at the mercy of a judicial opinion, the emergency and the danger are almost great enough to warrant Congress, by any increase of the Supreme Court, to secure the only decision which can save the country.

Men speak coolly of a decision against the constitutionality of the Legal-tender law. But they cannot have considered what it means. It means that no bank can pay its depositors—that no bank can pay its notes—that the man who owes $1,000 cannot pay it as he has contracted. He owes $30,000—it means general bankruptcy, from which none would escape but creditors and owners of unencumbered land. There is scarcely a mortgage which would not absorb the value of the mortgaged land; scarcely a merchant whose debts would not absorb his property. The country would be in a financial condition worse than that of the Confederacy. For their legal tenders depreciated gradually; ours would go down at once with instantaneous ruin to all.

J. Q. T.

Secretary of the Navy.

Being assured that the President elect and the advisers he may seek are fully able to organize the coming Administration without any volunteer aid, I do not write the few suggestions I here present, to be misinterpreted in any attempt to offer such aid. I only wish to call attention to certain general considerations relative to the Navy Department, which, it seems to me, have been lost sight of both by the public and politicians, in estimating the qualifications required in the presiding officer of that department. In your editorial upon Senator EDMUNDS' disqualifying bill, you forcibly remark:

"So it is with the navy. The vital need of professional knowledge hereafter in the Naval Bureaus is (with all due credit to the fidelity and honesty of Mr. WELLES) very apparent. The need of a man who shall understand in general what his subordinates are about—a master mind which in each department inquires special and technical knowledge—is very great, when we consider, for example, the vast sums spent annually in construction, &c. Among others, Admiral FOXZIE'S name has been suggested as that of a man thoroughly understanding these duties. Mr. EDMUNDS declares to Gen. GRANT with the force of a commandment "Thou shalt not have Admiral FOXZIE in thy Cabinet."

I would further add, that the Secretary of the Navy, unlike other officers of the Cabinet, is not only the counsellor of the President in affairs of statesmanship and policy, and the administration of vast and varied material requiring professional experience and knowledge, but he is the head of a large isolated and peculiar family, with many delicate and complicated relations in itself, and which it is not possible for any one to comprehend or manage without a long, familiar and practical acquaintance with those relations. Although, to some extent, this view applies to the army, yet the parallel between the two services is not close—and the peculiar knowledge required not so imperative. The army is at home, its members are blended with the influences of civil life; their domestic and social relations are more general; by constant contact with interests and pursuits outside of their profession there are guarantees against wrong and injustice, and opportunities for redressing them which the navy does not possess. This last is an institution, or institutes on a state existing in confined and limited communities all over the world. Remote from home protections and influences, its members are of necessity more permanently bound to the service, and any mistakes of incapacity or ignorance may be productive of gross and irreparable mischief. If these truths are admitted, the great need of special fitness for the position of the Navy Department must be apparent, and there is every hope and confidence that such fitness will be found by those who have the responsibility. A Correction.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Under the heading of "Reminiscences of John Brown's Men," I observe in the TIMES of the 4th instant an extract from the Washington correspondence of the Worcester Spy, in which the writer, after very generous mention of the war services of RICHARD REALF, the "so-called Secretary of State in the Provisional Government" of JOHN BROWN, quotes a couple of stanzas from a poem by Mr. REALF, recently printed in the Pensacola (Fla.) Observer, and adds his belief that the author is now in the regular army as a non-commissioned officer, stationed at Pensacola.

The writer is mistaken. The "war lyric" from which the quotation is made was originally published several years ago, and has doubtless floated into the Observer in the ordinary way, being mutilated on its passage. Mr. REALF is a resident of this City, quietly engaged in the discharge of the duties by which he earns his bread, and devoting his leisure hours to literary studies and pursuits. He has lost nothing of his young love of liberty—nothing of his early belief in the ultimate triumph of humanity over ignorance, prejudice, caste and privilege—nothing of his youthful faith that God has in store no blessing for noblest nations that will not some day be won by this nation. But with years and experience have come patience and charity; and while he holds that the costs of freedom have been fully paid in the lifting up of a degraded race from the sloughs of servitude, in our own escape from the deadly sickness which poisoned our politics, and in our recognition of the sanctity of natural rights, the venerableness of man's nature, and the identity of pure justice with political interest—he has learned also that (for himself at least) the highest work in which he can engage is to resist and put down whatever habit or tendency impairs his full ability to be a man, with a healthy soul, conscious of rights and duties, owning its gifts, and valuing above everything else the liberty to place its happiness in being noble and true. Thoroughly convinced that the reformation of the world—the resultation of things to reality—is not to be effected by hammering and chattering upon the outside of systems and societies, he prefers henceforward to work on spiritual essentials, beginning with his own nature.

The Hell Gate Obstructions—Important to Mariners.

The contractor for the removal of obstructions in Hell Gate wishes me to give notice to pilots and masters of vessels passing through the Gate to observe every precaution to prevent collisions.

It is a settled fact that masters and owners of vessels colliding with the contractor's tug and machinery at work over Frying Pan must make full indemnity for the damage done. It is also important, for public reasons of humanity, that collisions should be avoided, as large quantities of nitro-glycerine must be kept constantly on the spot, and liable to be exploded by the shock of percussion, which would be highly destructive to human life in case of collision.

Mr. SHELBOURNE, the contractor, particularly requests the pilots of the Sound steamers to slow their engines passing the point of his operations. Regular work on Frying Pan will commence on Monday, Jan. 11. GEORGE W. BLUNT.

Under Broadway.

NEW-YORK, Saturday, Jan. 9, 1869.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

The Broadway Bridge experiment seems to have been a failure, and yet the public necessity which it was intended to meet remains.

Has it never occurred to you that a neatly constructed culvert would require but about ten feet descent and ascent, would occupy comparatively small spaces in the sidewalks for entrances, would cost much less than a bridge, and, apart from the entrances, would cause no obstruction to travel whatever?

This seems to be a simple matter, and there is therefore no necessity to burden you with the details which occur to my mind. GEO. W. PAGE.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

State Securities Advancing—Hopeful Signs—Gov. Sprague's Investments—Gen. Rousseau's Purchase of Lands—Emancipation Day—The Orations—Torchlights—To Work in the New Year.

From Our Own Correspondent.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Saturday, Jan. 2, 1869.

About a month ago I had the pleasure of mentioning among hopeful indications of better times in this State the fact that all the State paper—bonds, bills receivable, and other issues, had advanced, some six, others ten, and some as high as twenty-one, per cent. above their previous value in the market. I have again occasion to record more

HOPEFUL SIGNS.

The latest event of this class is GOV. SPRAGUE'S purchase of a tract of land, partly within the City of Columbia, for manufacturing purposes. I say for these purposes, because there appears little other use to which the land could be put, and there is a thousand-horse power canal running through it. The tract contains 110 acres; sold for $21,000. The water power on the tract is a canal dug by the State thirty years ago, and never finished. The canal is about five miles in length, ending in this tract of land just bought by GOV. SPRAGUE. The canal is to be sold on condition that the purchaser will finish the work; which done, the water power will be one of the finest in its sites for manufactories to be found anywhere in our mid-country. The exit of the canal commands the canal, in some sense; and it is surmised that GOV. SPRAGUE, aware of that advantage, makes this purchase, with a view either to buying the canal itself entire, or of using this portion of the water power for mechanical purposes—rumor says, for a cotton factory. Whichever it be, it means business; and business like this will bring skilled operatives—voters and receivers and spenders of wages—who thus set the wheels of active work in motion.

Besides this purchase, GOV. SPRAGUE has bought an island upon the Georgia coast, near Savannah, and this is for agricultural use. So, the enterprising Governor means business—either in manufactories in Columbia or in planting near Savannah, or both. GOV. SPRAGUE is no carpet-bagger, and our people welcome as many such as will please to come. Need not bring money, but only the honest intent to make it honestly here, and brain and brawn enough to do it. Such men are no carpet-baggers. We want all such.

And, again, the New-Orleans Times states upon authority that Gen. ROUSSEAU has determined to make Louisiana his home, and signifies that purpose by purchasing one of the finest plantations in Southern Louisiana, near Brashear City, on Berwick's Bay. He is said to have already commenced arrangements for planting. This also means business. The South needs such men, and welcomes all such, be their capital what it may—money, brains or brawn.

EMANCIPATION DAY.

The negroes celebrated Emancipation Day, yesterday, with rather less éclat than heretofore, but with a reasonable measure of success. Shows that have no meat and bread in them are apt to wane in the negro's esteem. He is not naturally fond of abstractions. Four of their political societies formed a procession and terminated it at the African Methodist Episcopal Church, where orations were delivered. About 800 were present. On former occasions these audiences have consisted largely of women and girls, but here not over one-fourth were females. The procession bore several silk banners and quite a number of motto-banners. The devices on these latter were such as the following: "Let us have Peace," "Our Suffrage will Protect Us," "Liberty to All—Motto of the Colored Man," "Seekers of Liberty are Always a Unit," "No Division Amongst Us," "We Have Suffered Everything for Peace at Home," "The Last of Slavery the Colored Man Wipes Out," "Raise the Down-Trodden Everywhere," "We Prize Liberty the More From Having Been Slaves," "We Are at Bamity with None But Our Oppressors." The flags were those of the political societies present. The proceedings were opened with prayer by a mulatto preacher. The Orator of the Day—C. H. CHAMBERLAIN, the Attorney-General of the State, and a white man—was then introduced, and delivered his set oration. He opened with some handsome remarks upon liberty, which were very modestly applauded. He claimed that the white man had share in the joyful event they were celebrating, but several times referred to the whites of the State as "our enemies." This, whether true or false, was purely gratuitous, and could have no other effect than to embitter the minds of the negroes against the whites. In the same unfortunate direction were his dwelling upon the wickedness and arrant criminality of slavery; his unmeasured eulogium of Senator RANDOLPH, (colored,) who was declared to be (as it is contended) the low figure of $48,000. (These lots are sold by Mrs. GAINES,) when sold (owing to the defect in title, never thus far cured,) for one-fourth of their nominal value. Some of them were subsequently abandoned to the city and resold for extremely low prices.

In her petition to the Common Council, Mrs. GAINES offers to compromise her claim to this property for $1,500,000, or, according to her valuation, for $930,391 less than she could claim, viz.:

81 squares at the rate of those named sold in 1852	$675,563
Interest on same 16 years (to 1868) at 6 per cent.	648,576
Interest on same 16 years (to 1868) at 5 per cent.	606,288— 1,254,629
Total	$1,930,192

Upon the documents the Finance Committee have expressed no opinion, but have appended the opinions of E. WOODRUFF, Esq., and of C. M. WINTHROP, Esq. The former does not advise the city to longer defend the case, but does advise a settlement by compromise, if possible. The opinion of C. E. WHITNEY deprecates further litigation, and advises settlement. The report of the Finance Committee has not yet been acted upon.

The Late Hon. John M. Botts.

From the Richmond State Journal, Jan. 8.

The latest appearance of MR. BOTTS in public life was in July last, when he addressed the Republicans of the Constitutional CONVENTION, in company with F. H. PIERPOINT and ALEXANDER RIVES, on which occasion he enunciated the soundest principles for their guidance and success, and administered a most withering rebuke to the Democracy, whose destructive schemes and rebellious machinations he denounced with terrible energy and power. Since then, from the feebleness of his health, he has been almost entirely quiet in the retirement of his home, and only occasionally ventured into the city, where the triumphs of his youth had been achieved. The last time he was here he attended a meeting of the State Central Committee and freely expressed his views with regard to the course of the party in its treatment of the question of disfranchisement, and strenuously opposed the policy of universal amnesty as an offset for universal suffrage.

His disease is believed to have been an enormous accumulation of fat upon the heart, to such an extent as to so much embarrass the action of the heart as to render it unable to propel the blood through the system, except with great difficulty and imperfectly. All his symptoms, the dropsical swelling of the lower extremities—the congestion of the kidneys, at the liver, of the lungs, of the brain—were the natural results of the slow and languid circulation of the blood through the veins. He died of disease of the heart, which had probably existed for years, and had been slowly and gradually approaching an inevitably fatal result.

As soon as GOV. WELLES was informed of the death of this eminent public man, he ordered the bell on the Capitol Square to be tolled till sundown, as a mark of respect to his memory, and as its solemn tones resound mournfully through the city, the heart of each patriot responds—"A good and great man has fallen."

His remains will be brought to the city for interment in the family burying-ground, where now rest those of his wife, a favorite son who died in Mexico during the war of 1846, and several other children. The funeral will take place on Saturday, and we have been requested to state that the friends and admirers of the deceased will meet at the Mayor's office, at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, to make the necessary arrangements to celebrate his obsequies.

The Prisoner Woods Identified at Hamilton, Ontario—He is not the Ulster County Murderer.

From the Hamilton (Ontario) Times, Jan. 7.

The party giving his name as JOSEPH WOODS, who was arrested here on the 28th ult., on suspicion of being the murderer SMITH, for whom a large reward is offered, turns out to be a rascal of another dye, and given to a more respectable and fashionable order of crime than foul murder. As before mentioned, he gave contradictory accounts of his travels for the past two or three months, which circumstance strengthened the suspicions of the Police authorities here, that if he was not the culprit for whom he was arrested, he must be some other criminal who had fled from the United States to escape the penalty of justice, and hence his detention until his identity could be satisfactorily determined. Yesterday he questioned the Chief of Police concerning the various crimes which would render one liable to extradition under the treaty, and seemed to gain information satisfactorily to himself, as he was on the point of making disclosures, when he finally thought proper to delay any admissions until after consulting his counsel. This forenoon the Chief of Police received answer to a letter of inquiry sent to the Mayor of Canton, Ohio, the prisoner having named that city as his last place of residence, and given the names of various parties whom he claimed as relatives. The Mayor had visited such parties, who repudiated relationship, but stated that they knew a person answering the description given, who had been in Canton some time since, that his name was JOSEPH WOODS DAY, and that he had escaped from Wilmington, Del. It was also added that he was believed to be insane. This piece of information and the repudiation of relationship may have been from motives rendered obvious by a despatch received this afternoon from the Chief of the Police Department of Philadelphia, as the effects were:

Chief of Police Davis, Hamilton:

"The prisoner you have in custody is JOSEPH WOODS DAY, defaulting Cashier of the Bank of Delaware, at Wilmington. The bank is fully secured, and he is not wanted."

Mrs. Gaines' Estate—Her Claims against New-Orleans.

From the New-Orleans Times, Jan. 3.

An application was made by Mrs. MYRA CLARK GAINES, in the month of September last, to the City Council, to quiet and perfect the titles of their vendees to the tract of land lying between Bayou-road and the Old Canal, and bounded between the river and the lake by Dorgenois-street and Bayou St. John. This property, which contains nearly 125 acres, was purchased by the city from the well-known notary named EVARISTE BLANC, in 1834, for $48,000. Mrs. GAINES claims that the property was sold in violation of the rights of her minor children, and that the city has no right to dispose of it. The Council, however, refused to grant the petition, and Mrs. GAINES has brought suit against the city for the property, which is valued at $1,500,000.

A RAILROAD SUIT.

From the Concord (N. H.) Statesman, Jan. 9.

In the case of the Concord Railroad against GEORGE CLOUGH, the Referees rendered judgment against defendant for $5,635, and on questions contingent to decisions of the Court, the further sum of $5,509, for not returning reduced rates of fare taken to the Ticket Master, as required, and for joint tickets over roads purchased of ticket-agents by defendant, $2,000. This result, while not as satisfactory to Mr. CLOUGH and his friends as they hoped, because they have believed, and now believe, that the railroad has no legal or moral claim whatever upon him, still is of such a nature as not to reflect upon his character for integrity.

Mr. CLOUGH testified before the referee, and frankly stated that he had been in the habit, openly, of carrying articles of freight over the road without paying for their carriage; from which transactions, in a series of years, he made considerable profit; also that he had been in the habit of purchasing through coupon tickets from passengers stopping off at way stations, and from agents in full fare, or other passengers; and that from this system he derived considerable sums of money, the amount of which he estimated as well as he could; that he had also allowed refreshments and other articles to be carried and sold on the cars, and had received a portion of the profits for many years, and it is feared the entire field may be destroyed. So much progress has been made by the flames that it is estimated that the cost of extinguishing them before they have spread over a space of a thousand acres will be not less than $150,000. Twenty-two loaded wagons and all the tools of the miners have been lost thus far. The Millar mines are carried on by A. MILLER & Co., of which firm Mr. CHARLES MILLER, of this city, was formerly a member.

The coal field over which this great subterranean deluge of fire is sweeping, is one of the most valuable on the Monongahela, and extends a distance of some eight or ten miles. It is difficult to say what will be the result of this underground conflagration if it is not checked very soon. Wherever a vein of coal extends the fire must follow it, and the whole Pittsburg coal region may yet be endangered. Let some great lake of Pennsylvania oil be tapped by the resistless stream of fire, let the underground gases be turned on, let the vast beds of coal throw out their strength, and the whole Keystone State, or at least a large portion of it, will form the vent of a subterranean hell: interior only to those which in other quarters of the globe break out in blazing volcanoes from the surface of the earth.

Mrs. Gaines' Estate—Her Claims against New-Orleans.

From the New-Orleans Times, Jan. 3.

An application was made by Mrs. MYRA CLARK GAINES, in the month of September last, to the City Council, to quiet and perfect the titles of their vendees to the tract of land lying between Bayou-road and the Old Canal, and bounded between the river and the lake by Dorgenois-street and Bayou St. John. This property, which contains nearly 125 acres, was purchased by the city from the well-known notary named EVARISTE BLANC, in 1834, for $48,000. Mrs. GAINES claims that the property was sold in violation of the rights of her minor children, and that the city has no right to dispose of it. The Council, however, refused to grant the petition, and Mrs. GAINES has brought suit against the city for the property, which is valued at $1,500,000.

REWARDS.

CHARLEMAGNE TOWER, MAYOR'S OFFICE, NEW-YORK, Jan. 6, 1869.

About 9 o'clock A. M. on the day before Christmas, in East Twelfth-street, between University-place and Broadway, two men were seen coming through said street from 5th-avenue toward Fourteenth-street, and approached one of the nurse-girls who were playing in the street. One of them struck the girl a violent blow in the face, and the other only looked on approvingly. If the latter does not will soon hear of himself. He shall receive from me a reward of One Thousand Dollars, and from the District-Attorney a guarantee against prosecution.

If the person who addressed to "James Logan, City," an envelope that was found in the pocket torn from the murdered girl will make himself known, exposing his identity by writing from dictation, he shall receive as a special reward from me of One Thousand Dollars, and shall be treated as confidentially as he may desire to be by the District-Attorney.

If any person saw a man about seven o'clock of the morning named, passing hastily bareheaded through Twelfth-street toward Second-avenue, and perhaps in his shirt-sleeves; or, if any person supplied any man that answered to that description, some 5'6; or then gave assistance to any man who had a fresh cut on left hand, such person is earnestly requested to communicate information to the District-Attorney, although it may seem to such person trivial; and if, by the evidence or aid of that official it or like information, such person will receive a suitable reward from me.

If any person knows the whereabouts of James Logan, 28 years old, 5 feet 6½ inches high, weight about 130 pounds, having figure 3 and letters J. L. tattooed on fore-arm, having florid complexion, upon his left arm in India ink, having florid complexion, sandy hair, with a small round scar over right eye, also a brown mole on his forehead over left eye, and who was discharged from Bellevue Hospital on Dec. 14 inst., and will give information which results in the arrest of said described James Logan, such person shall be paid by me a reward of Five Hundred Dollars.

Although the ordinances limit me to offering five Hundred Dollars, and, in consequence of odd occurrences in this City, I cannot without legislation, officially obtain the money for the above rewards, I will become personally responsible for each of them and secure the rest of the necessary legislation. Take no one's word for it, but gamble about this matter.

A. OAKEY HALL, Mayor.
Approved: SAMUEL B. GARVIN,
District-Attorney.

THE ROGERS MURDER.

SURRENDER OF LOGAN, THE ALLEGED MURDERER.

What He Says Regarding His Movements since the Murder—He Declares His Innocence of the Crime.

The time has come when the story of the pursuit of the assassin of CHARLES M. ROGERS can be fully told, as last evening, at a quarter before 9 o'clock, the person to whom all the circumstances of the case pointed as the murderer was in the custody of the officers of the law.

THE CLUES.

The public is entirely familiar with the story of the murder, and it is not necessary now to restate it. Within an hour after the outrage Capt. CAFFREY, of the Fifteenth Precinct, within whose command the affair had happened, was in full possession of all the facts then to be obtained, and had entered on the work of following the assassin. The clues were distinct and were as follows: First, the description given by Mr. ROGERS of his assassin; and next the knife-sheath, the fragment of his coat, and his hat, left by the murderer in the grasp of the assailed. The chief clue, however, was an envelope found in the pocket of the fragment of the coat addressed "James Logan City," and superscribed, "This will be given you by Tom." This envelope pointed to the assassin as one JAMES LOGAN, liberated from Sing Sing on the 14th of October last, where he had served a term for burglary.

THE CHASE.

With this clue in his hands Capt. CAFFREY set his detectives to work. Sergt. LOWERY and Officers GILLEN, HARRIS and BARKER, all of the Fifteenth Precinct, and MCCAFFERTY and BUTCHER, of the Sixteenth Precinct, were especially charged with the pursuit. GILLEN and BARKER, early on the morning of the stabbing, started on his track and succeeded in discovering that he had been seen in Jackson-square, hatless and generally dishevelled. This was about 8 o'clock in the morning, and an hour after the murder. Nothing more was heard of him that day, but early the next morning it was found that he had been in a house in Seventh-avenue, near Seventeenth-street. That retreat being discovered, he suddenly shifted his quarters to the east side of town, and was next heard of in a lager-beer saloon in Fourteenth-street, two doors from Avenue A. He had just left when GILLEN entered in pursuit of him. The tireless officer waited patiently for hours, but unavailingly, for his return. On the morning of the 1st instant MCCAFFERTY and BUTCHER were called in, and the latter was found to be invaluable by reason of his accurate knowledge of the person of the hunted man, and of his haunts and associates. Through BUTCHER, a "crossman" or thief was called in to aid in the search, and did so effectually until he found that LOGAN was wanted for a murder, when he declined to do more, and the officers thenceforth worked without any assistance from "crossmen," which is always so powerful in matters of this character. Thus left alone, the officers did not lose sight of their object, however, and again found trace of him in Fourteenth-street, and he seems to have been there most of the time during the 3d, 4th and 5th, and on the 6th he flitted to Sixteenth-street, where it was found he had been in hiding with a man named CLARK, who was also wanted by the Police. On the 7th he was followed to Eighteenth-street, between First and Second avenues, and during that night he shifted to the same street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues; but he found it also too hot to hold him, and flitted back before daylight to his old quarters in the neighborhood of Fourteenth-street and Avenue A. There he remained housed until about 2 o'clock of yesterday, when the Detectives finally, for the time being, lost sight of him. During all this time the officers were constantly close upon him. Go where he would by day or by night, he found LOWERY, or GILLEN, or HARRIS, or BUTCHER upon his heels, and turn where he could, found himself confronted with these sleepless officers of the outraged law. It was a question of endurance between him and his pursuers; he could not rest, and they would not, so long as he remained uncaptured. Yesterday both sides had become thoroughly exhausted, and the hunted man, brought at last to bay, turned suddenly upon his pursuers and robbed them of the credit of his capture.

THE SURRENDER.

At 8:45 o'clock last evening, Sergt. FITZGERALD, of the Twentieth Precinct, was sitting quietly at the desk in the Twentieth Precinct Station-house, in Thirty-fifth-street, between Eighth and Ninth avenues, when two men entered. One of these was a man about 26 years old, 5 feet 4½ inches high, weight about 129 pounds, having florid complexion, gray eyes, dark brown hair, with a small round scar over right eye, also a scar on his forehead over left eye.

This man had on a new shop-made coat, many sizes too large for him, and a hat that did not fit. He approached the desk, and holding out to the Sergeant a copy of a newspaper containing the proclamation of Mayor HALL, said that he was the man described in that document. The dumb-founded Sergeant asked what he meant, and LOGAN replied that he was wanted, it seemed, and had come to give himself up. Capt. HEDDEN, in command of the Twentieth Precinct, soon entering, took charge of the affair, and in the new comer at once recognized JAMES LOGAN, the burglar, who was an old-time official acquaintance. The man with LOGAN proved to be his brother-in-law, a reputable, mechanic named JOHN MCLANUS, residing at No. 243 West Twenty-seventh-street. The story told by LOGAN was that he is entirely innocent of the murder, and that he had been residing quietly in Twenty-seventh-street, without any knowledge that he was wanted by the authorities, until about an hour before he appeared in the Station-house, when the proclamation of the Mayor happened to meet his eye. The directed envelope he was even ready to explain, and said that while in Sing Sing he worked in the quarries outside, and it was the custom for the convicts to ignore the Chaplain in their correspondence with outside friends, and trust their letters to any chance conveyance that offered. He was, therefore, certain that the letter which had been in the envelope found in the pocket of the fragment of the coat had been sent to him by some prison pal after his departure, and that TOM had neglected to deliver it. Capt. HEDDEN listened quietly to this explanation, and then notified Police Headquarters and Capt. CAFFREY that JAMES LOGAN had delivered himself up. Capt. CAFFREY and Detective GILLEN immediately proceeded to the Twentieth Precinct Station house, and LOGAN, being brought out of the cell, was examined by these officials. All of the marks described by Mayor HALL were found upon the person of this man. The inside of the sleeve of the torn coat was blood-stained, which had been thought to have been the result of a wound received by the assassin during the struggle with ROGERS, and LOGAN's arm was particularly examined, without, however, finding any mark of a recent wound. After the examination of the prisoner, he was remanded back to his cell, where he will be held to await the action of Coroner FLYNN.

Thus ended a chase that was as determined as it was persistent. From the hour of the murder the authorities have wanted JAMES LOGAN, the burglar, as the assassin. That JAMES LOGAN they at last run to earth, compelled him to present himself at the nearest Station-house. He denies the crime with which they charge him, but the officers profess to have ample evidence to justify the pursuit. It is proper to add that Mayor HALL took a deep interest in the chase and an active part in its direction, and before he issued his proclamation yesterday morning, calling for the apprehension of JAMES LOGAN, was fully advised of all the circumstances of the case.

Capt. CAFFREY was still engaged, at a late hour last night, with the indefatigable GILLEN in the pursuit of the tall and timorous scoundrel who held the murderer's coat, and from the opposite side of the street called out, "JIM, don't do it."

The Secret Movement Against the Police Justices.

The paragraph in the TIMES a few days ago to the effect that a strong, secret and probably successful movement was on foot in this City, looking toward a speedy removal of the Police Magistrates, caused considerable excitement in certain circles, and those interested in maintaining the present state of affairs have made so determined an effort to sound the rumored movement, that the projectors have themselves taken the alarm, and in order to prevent the TIMES from learning more of the facts, the leaders in the secret movement have issued a confidential circular to the members of the Secret League, headed by the cabalistic letters or initials "P. J. R.," in which the recipient is warned against communicating the details of any meeting held by the League to a representative of the Press, on pain of the severest penalties. This circular has had the effect of closing some of the channels of information, though enough has been learned to show that the proposed movement is rapidly gaining strength and purpose.

On Wednesday evening last an informal meeting was held at the Fifth-avenue Hotel by the leaders or heads of the several ward organizations, when a plan of operations was partially decided upon, and certain measures taken to prevent these proceedings from becoming public. On Thursday afternoon a meeting was also held at one of the leading Broadway hotels, by a large number of prominent merchants of this City, who represent several millions of dollars in property, at which meeting two or three prominent lawyers "presiding" at the New-York Bar were consulted with on the feasibility of having the State Constitution so amended as to create all those persons holding such judicial positions as have cognizance of criminal offences, out of office, in order that better men may be appointed to their places. Whether the result of this consultation was satisfactory to the Leaguers is, of course, unknown outside of the circle.

There were several meetings held last evening in several of the wards, per appointment, though as the places of meeting have been changed, no details of the proceedings could be ascertained, and the probability is that in the future the P. J. R. League will succeed in keeping their proceedings more private than they have hitherto succeeded in doing.

PROTECTION OF ART.

Movement Among Artists to Secure Registered Titles to their Productions.

The adjourned meeting of artists who favor the passage of a law for the registering of works of art of every description, took place yesterday at Mr. MACDONALD'S studio, No. 697 Broadway. The Chairman called the meeting to order and the following report of the Committee of five was read and adopted:

REPORT.

There can be but one opinion as to the inefficiency of the Patent and Copyright laws, as far as they refer to the works of artists, and artistic productions. No laws have yet been made which have especial reference to the protection to works of art. The present Copyright law does not cover the cases that have arisen since it was made. The framers of the law could not have anticipated the progress of art that has been made in this country. The Patent laws, as far as they relate to the sculpture and trade marks, will answer very well for the present, but, if the clauses they contain were embodied in a Regnum law and more improved so as to make the forms less complicated and the fees lower a vast advantage would be gained. The object of our present movement, as we understand it, is to obtain the passage of a law or laws which will afford protection and secure to artists and others engaged in any way in pursuits that may be calculated to improve the taste of the nation, the sole right, title, interest and full ownership of their works and productions.

Your Committee is well satisfied that there must be many conflicting opinions as to the manner in which the passage of such a law is to be secured; and it is to be expected that there will be many more notions and differences regarding the principal clauses of the law; but your Committee indulge in the hope that all who have any real interests in, and desires for the progress of art in its broadest and most liberal sense in our country, and for the elevation of the tastes of the people, will certainly be in favor of some regulation which will fully protect them in the entire ownership of their productions and the benefits of their labors. With these convictions, your Committee would respectfully recommend the presentation to Congress, at an early date, of a bill embodying the following:

The name of the law should be "An act to promote the progress of the Fine Arts." It should provide for the registry of all kinds of paintings, statuary, engravings, prints, plates, basso and alto relievos, intaglios, charts, maps, drawings, etchings, lithographs, photographs and designs, on all kinds of surfaces and in every description of material, granting to the applicant a patent or its equivalent to obtain its production, and protecting him in such reproduction, or any part thereof, by any person or persons, in kind of material or on any kind of surface in any manner whatever.

This law should provide immediate and direct redress for the owner of any design against those who shall make use of its copyright or reproducing it in any manner, provided it may have been registered. The law should be so framed as to enable the party infringed upon to place an injunction upon the offender or offenders without any long process to seize the copies or counterfeits, and to hold them until complete satisfaction be rendered.

The law should specify the duties of the register and the fees which he is to receive. It should specify the fees to be paid by the artist or designer, and they should be as small as possible, and the time of protection extended as long as possible. The present copyright law allows twenty-one years and the cost is but $1—the rates should not be over half. And your Committee beg to suggest to those who may have the framing of this law, that they consider, whether the infringement of the law, the copying, pirating upon or counterfeiting of a design that may be properly registered, should not be considered a penal offence, and be punished as such.

It would not be difficult to draw such a bill or law, nor would it require much effort to place it before our representatives in the National Legislature.

Your Committee would recommend, therefore, that a committee of ten be appointed by this meeting, representing the different branches of art, and it be directed to draw a bill embracing the main features embodied in this report, and to add any other clauses that would strengthen the law or make it more effective, and that this new committee be directed to report at our next meeting, which should be held in some public hall in this City.

Your Committee has not attempted to take up all those questions which have a bearing upon, and are in favor of, or opposed to a Registry law. It simply states facts, leaving the discussion thereof to this meeting.

JAMES WILSON MACDONALD.
JAMES HOPE.
BYRON M. PICKETT.

Mr. MACDONALD rose for a personal explanation. He said his remarks at the last meeting in regard to the National Academy were not properly understood. He could not possibly have any hard feelings against any persons connected with the Academy either as gentlemen or artists, and he disclaimed all feelings of that nature, but that he was desperately opposed to the present administration of that institution, and he would remain so until a change was made.

After the regular business of the meeting was over, Mr. FAIRMAN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to consider the propriety and desirability of organizing a society of artists for the purpose of concert of action in matters involving the interests of art and artists; such Society to embrace all professional artists willing to be thus associated, and also students of art with such restrictions as will favor the mutual interests named.

This resolution was carried, and the meeting then adjourned subject to the call of the Chairman.

It is understood that the next meeting will take place at the Cooper Institute on the 1st of February.

THE EXPRESS ROBBERY.

The District-Attorney, after having continued the examination of Mr. BROWN for a short time—during the course of which, however, nothing more of interest was developed—closed the direct examination. The prisoners refused to cross-examine the witness, and Col. SHERWOOD was called by the District Attorney.

The testimony of the Colonel, which was introduced merely for technical purposes, concluded the case on behalf of the people, and the prosecution rested.

The Court then stated to the prisoners that if they had any witnesses whom they wished to bring forward they were at liberty to put them upon the stand. To this MORTON returned that he had all the evidence which a reasonable man could desire of their innocence, but that he did not choose then to produce it. Justice FERRAS then informed them that if they wished themselves to make any statement the statute gave them the right to do so, and that the Court was then prepared to listen to it. MORTON, in declining for both, stated that he did not intend to countenance by word or deed the legality of the present proceeding. The Court, in answer, remarked that many were obliged to make this recognition who would fain avoid it.

The prisoners then applied for an adjournment for a day or two longer; and in urging through MORTON the propriety of granting the application, stated that their counsel was absent; that in view of this circumstance it was unjust to continue the proceedings, and that the reason of such absence was that he (their counsel) had expected them in New-York on a writ of habeas corpus, issued the evening previous by Judge INGRAHAM.

The Court stated that, judicially, it had no knowledge of the issuing of such a writ; that so far as their dilemma arose from the want of proper legal attendance, they were themselves in fault, since it had repeatedly, both before and since the commencement of the examination, urged upon them the importance of employing counsel, and that for these reasons it could not grant an adjournment.

Having arrived at this decision, the Court took a recess at 1 o'clock until 2:30.

At 2:30 P. M., on the reassembling of the Court, District-Attorney BATES appeared for the prisoners, and on behalf of each of them had the following protest entered upon the Justice's minutes:

"He (each of the defendants) protests against proceeding with this examination at the present time, for the reason that a writ of habeas corpus has, upon his petition or the petition of his counsel, been duly issued by a Justice of the Supreme Court, and served upon the Sheriff of this county, whereby said Sheriff was required to produce his body, with the cause of his detention as a witness against MARTIN and others, before the said Judge in the City of New-York, at 10 A. M. of this day, and that the rights of said defendant are jeopardized and violated by proceeding with this examination at this time."

This having been done, Mr. BATES renewed the application for an adjournment, naming Monday as the adjourned day.

The District-Attorney objected. The purpose of procuring this adjournment was that time might be had to perfect a device to cheat the people of Westchester County out of jurisdiction over this case.

Mr. BATES replied, in effect, that if there were any such design afoot, he had no knowledge of it, nor if he had, would he do anything to further it. He asked it as a matter of personal favor and professional courtesy. The District-Attorney had said that he (BATES) was an honest man, and he himself had no doubt of that fact. At least he thought himself quite as honest as the law would allow. Why not, then, give him credit for his honesty?

The District-Attorney said that it was not Mr. BATES whom he feared, but some parties of whom Mr. BATES, when he asked for this adjournment, was making himself the unconscious tool.

Mr. BATES then demanded it as a right of the prisoners. The present proceeding was a judicial farce, if the Court did not rule that the prisoners had a right to the adjournment. They now, for the first time since the commencement of the examination, appeared by counsel. They had no witnesses present, nor could get them into Court before Monday morning. If this would not justify the Court in granting an adjournment, what would?

The Court decided not to accede. It was not responsible for the present state of things; and, besides, it had to observe the rights of the public as well as those of the criminal. It could not consent to the adjournment.

CHARLES E. SPRAGUE then, under direction of his counsel, stated, in answer to questions put to him by the Court, that his name was CHARLES E. THOMPSON, and that he resided in New-York, but declined to say more.

ISAAC D. MORTON made a similar statement in reference to himself.

Counsel for prisoners now asked for a subpœna, addressed to Wm. F. BOWEN, of New-York. On being asked when he wished to have it returnable, he replied, Monday. The Court would not assent to this, on the ground that it would be equivalent to adjourning the proceedings until that day, and issued the summons returnable forthwith. This not being acceptable to Mr. BATES, he requested that the Court might issue a subpœna duces tecum, directed to WILLIAM F. HOWE, requiring him to appear on Monday morning next, and produce certain letters written by PUTNAM W. BROWN, and also three impressions, in wax, of a key, bearing the initials P. W. B., M. H. & Co. The Court refused to make this returnable on Monday, as counsel desired, and made it returnable, as in the former case, forthwith.

This was as unsatisfactory to Mr. BATES as the former subpœna. He said that Mr. HOWE was in New-York and could not be brought into Court immediately, as though he were only in the next room. The subpœna was useless.

The counsel then requested the Justice to enter upon his minutes several objections to these last proceedings. Much time was spent in entering these, together with the counter objections made by the District-Attorney; after which Mr. BATES asked that PUTNAM W. BROWN be recalled for cross-examination. On objections by the District-Attorney, the Court refused to allow this to be done.

Mr. BATES entered his objection to this refusal at length, upon the Justice's minutes, and the examination was then concluded.

The Justice decided to send the papers to the Grand Jury, and committed MORTON and THOMPSON to await its action. PUTNAM W. BROWN was also committed, in default of $5,000 bail, as witness for the prosecution.

Lecture by Waterhouse Hawkins.

A lecture was delivered last night by Mr. WATERHOUSE HAWKINS, at the Cooper Institute, upon "The Horse." The lecturer, after dilating upon the noble qualities of the animal in question, commenced drawing his skeleton upon a blackboard, and as he added bone after bone, explained its specific use, and its connection with the adjoining sections. In doing so, he frequently interspersed his statements with humorous remarks. In closing the lecture he said that the horse may not have been constructed with a view to the use of man, but he was admirably calculated for it, both in respect to his capacity for drawing and for carrying burdens. In the excavations at Montmartre, in France, fifty years ago, were found certain bones of an animal, which enabled Baron CUVIER to form conclusions as to its entire structure. The beast became known as the Paleotherium, and resembled both a rhinoceros and a tapir. It had three toes, forming a partial hoof, and he thought it to be a step in the progress of creation toward the modern horse. The Hippotherium, the remains of which indicate a still nearer approximation, had a similar foot. History speaks of a horse ridden by JULIUS CÆSAR which had three toes. This animal is expatiated upon in the late life of CÆSAR by LOUIS NAPOLEON. His toes were an eccentric suggestion by nature of his previous types. These types realized the essentials of the horse, but were devoid of his beautiful proportions. In alluding to the Greek absurdity of a centaur, which was a combination of horse and man, the lecturer said that a human mouth, constantly at work in mastication, could not take in sufficient food for the stomach of a horse. The speaker displayed a knowledge of this fact by depicting the body of the horse portion of the Centaur much shorter than that of a genuine animal of the kind. In alluding to the Cossack and Circassian horses, as having their forms hidden by long hair, HAWKINS observed that, on examination, they showed all the necessary elements of speed and beauty. The ponies of Shetland and the Orkneys, he said, being deprived during a portion of the year of pasture, proceeded to the seashore and eat such fish as were thrown upon it. The lecture was quite interesting.

National Guard News and Gossip.

In Special Orders No. 1, Adjt.-Gen. Townsend also announces that Special Orders No. 318, series of 1868, directing the First and Third Regiments Cavalry, First Division N. G. S. N. Major-General Alexander Shaler, commanding First Division N. G. S. N. Y., will promulgate this order.

The officers and members of Company I, Twelfth Regiment "National Greys," have issued a neat series of invitation cards for their third annual hop, which will take place at Apollo Hall, corner of Twenty-eighth-street and Broadway, on Monday evening, Jan. 25. Capt. John H. French and his associates will undoubtedly achieve a success.

The annual invitation hop of Company H, of the Eighth Regiment, will take place on Friday evening, Feb. 5, at the regimental armory, and cards are now out for that event.

One of the prettiest cards laid on our table this season is that issued by Company E, of the Seventy-first Regiment, (American Guard,) in which the Company announce that they intend giving an invitation ball and soirée, at Irving Hall, on Thursday evening, Jan. 28.

A meeting of the Veteran Association of the Seventy-first Regiment will be held on the 14th inst., at the regimental armory, No. 118 West Thirty-second-street, for the purpose of adopting a constitution and by-laws. The organization is a benevolent one.

The members of the Seventy-first Regiment are ordered to assemble for battalion drill, in full fatigue, at 7:30 o'clock on the evenings of the 20th and 25th inst., at the arsenal, Thirty-fifth-street and Seventh-avenue. Field and staff, non-commissioned staff and First Sergeants to report at 7:45 P. M. The class drills have been resumed since the 4th inst. Edwin C. Imlay has been elected Second Lieutenant. The following privates have been discharged, viz.: Sergeant Frederick George W. Gill, Company G; J. Henry Ransom, Company F; J. M. Gustave Bahls, band. Private Chas. J. Romaine, Company E, has been expelled.

Invitations are now being issued by the Committee of Arrangements for the projected reception and promenade concert to be given by the Seventy-third Regiment, at the Academy of Music, on the anniversary of Washington's Birthday. The tickets on sale are disappearing rapidly, and the success of the affair is already assured. They can only be obtained from members of the regiment.

The Washington Grey Cavalry have decided to adopt the following new and handsome dress: A yellow metal, similar pattern to that worn by Emperor Napoleon's Cent Gardes, the same to be fire-gilt, with black, white and gray trimmings; a dark blue coat, dress pattern and short skirts, gray pantaloons, open on outer seam half up to the knee, and to be trimmed with broad gold braid; the colored worsted lace to be suspended to a broad gold band; the uniform for the rank and file to be of the same pattern, excepting that the jacket will be of gray cloth, and the trimmings to be of silver lace. The helmet will be of German silver, richly plated.

We are desired to state that the tickets for the grand reception by the New-York State Military Association, ($2 each,) at Twenty-second Regiment Armory, on the 19th inst.; and tickets (without charge) for the annual address before the Association, at Steinway Hall, on 20th inst., are now ready, and can be had of the several regimental commanders.

Major Keat, in compliance with a resolution of the Board of Officers of the Washington Grey Cavalry, has placed at the disposal of that command two gold recruiting medals, one to be awarded to the officer and the other to the non-commissioned officer who shall enlist the largest number of recruits from Jan. 1 until April 1, 1869. The following appointments are announced: Lorenzo F. Baker to be Sergeant-Major; Charles B. Barton, Quartermaster-Sergeant; Henry H. Hart, Sergeant Standard-Bearer; Abraham L. Batterson, Hospital Steward; Theodore D. Bunce, Right Guide; Gerald Lovell L. Van Allen, Left General Guide. A regular meeting of the Board of Officers will be held at headquarters on the first Monday of every month.

Lieut.-Col. William B. Allen was on Monday evening unanimously elected Colonel of the Fifty-fifth Regiment, vice Le Gal resigned. Capt. John Cash was also elected Major, vice Goldschmidt, resigned, and he will probably soon rise to the Lieutenant-Colonelcy in due time.

The ball of the Lindsey Blues at Irving Hall on Thursday, was a grand success, despite the neighboring ball of the Americus Club at the Academy.

Another Accident on the Erie Railway.

A collision took place between two freight trains on the Erie Railway, near Suffern's Station, on Friday afternoon, resulting in a heavy loss of property to the Company. One of the employes of the Company, who was on one of the trains at the time of the collision, reports that two freight trains, going in opposite directions, collided with such force as to utterly demolish one of the locomotives, the other locomotive being also badly damaged. While the trains were standing upon the track another freight train coming from the west struck the rear car of the train which was headed eastward smashing it into fragments and seriously damaging several cars next adjoining. The accident appears to have been caused by culpable neglect and carelessness on the part of the depot masters at the adjoining stations, and is indeed fortunate that no loss of life was occasioned. The fact that there was none was owing to the fact that the engineers and firemen leaped from their engines to the ground before the collision took place.

The Union League Club and the Election Frauds.

The Union League Club of this City has, it seems, determined upon some practical measures in the matter of naturalization and election frauds.

A committee has lately been appointed, of which Hon. R. C. HAWKINS is Chairman, and Col. GRANVILLE P. HARRIS, Secretary, to memorialize Congress for such a change in the Naturalization laws as will prevent future frauds, and to enact a general law on the subject.

The memorial, of which the following is a copy, is now in circulation throughout the country, and we trust all good citizens, without distinction of party, will give it their support.

To the Honorable, the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners, citizens of the United States, native and naturalized, respectfully represent: That it is alleged and generally believed, and as we are convinced can be clearly proved, that for some years past, but especially in the recent election, gross frauds have been perpetrated upon the suffrage, by the naturalization of persons not entitled to citizenship according to law, and upon evidence manifestly false and fraudulent, by the issue of certificates of naturalization in blank, or to other persons than those whose names are inserted; and by forgery and falsification of such certificates, and a corrupt and wicked use of the powers of State Courts and their officers in this matter. Every good citizen abhors such acts as grievous crimes against the safety of the Commonwealth and the liberty of the people. We believe that the existing laws on the subject of naturalization are inadequate effectually to prevent or to punish these crimes, and we ask that they should be revised and made more efficient. We respectfully ask your honorable body in your wisdom to frame and enact a law or laws:

1. Which shall restrict the power of conferring the citizenship of the United States to the Courts of the United States; or, where these Courts are not as accessible as tribunals possessing this power should always be to the worthy immigrant, to officers of the United States, such, for example, as the Registers in Bankruptcy who can be found in any Congressional District, and may be required to hold sessions in each county.

2. Which shall require of all persons the record in the Courts and in the office of the Secretary of State of the declaration of an intention and of the application to become a citizen, a certain period of time before naturalization, and forbidding any other proof of the time of such declaration or the period of residence in the country except such record.

3. Which shall provide for the publication of the names and residences, and description of all persons declaring their intentions, and of all persons to be naturalized; and shall authorize any citizen to appear in open Court in order to contest the right of any such person to naturalization, or to set aside any naturalization now or hereafter improperly granted.

4. Which shall provide for the effectual punishment of all persons who are concerned in any forgery or fraud in making, obtaining or using any false or wrongful certificate of naturalization.

5. Which shall declare null and void every certificate or order of naturalization heretofore made in fraud, or in violation of the existing law, and shall make it a felony for any person to utter or use in any way any such order or certificate.

And inasmuch as the acts of naturalization now in force were passed at various times, and doubts exist as to the effect of some of them, we submit that a general act is expedient, in which the whole law on the subject shall be embodied and clearly expressed.

And your petitioners respectfully refer to the act of 1802, passed during the Administration of THOMAS JEFFERSON, and not repealed until 1828, for the outline of such a system of registration of persons applying to become citizens, as we pray you to restore.

Interference of the Sheriff with the Congressional Investigating Committee.

On Friday last the session of the Congressional Committee on Election Frauds was interrupted by the appearance of Sheriff O'BRIEN, accompanied by a number of his deputies, who arrested seven of the witnesses summoned to appear before the Committee, and conveyed them to the Sixth Ward Station-house. The only explanation given by the Sheriff of this singular proceeding was that the men were suspected of being thieves, but, on calling the Station-house, only one of them was identified as such, and the rest were, of course, discharged. Marshal MURRAY subsequently appeared before the Committee, and testified that Mr. KERR, the Democratic member of the Committee from Indiana, pointed out the witness to the Sheriff when the arrests were made.

Yesterday the Committee-room was guarded by twelve policemen, who were directed to prevent any further intrusion on the deliberations of the Committee.

It is said that the men arrested were "repeaters," who had been summoned before the Committee to give evidence as to the manner in which election frauds are committed, and that the action of the Sheriff was taken in order to prevent the disclosure of certain facts which might have tended to implicate persons holding high official positions.

Snow-Balling in the Streets.

The attention of the Police authorities has frequently been directed to the dangerous practice of snow-balling indulged in by groups of thoughtless small boys, and sometimes even by full-grown men—in our streets, everywhere. Only a few days since a shocking casualty was produced by this means. A lady and gentleman were riding through a cross-town street in a sleigh, when the horse attached to the vehicle was struck on the head by a flying ball of snow, hurled by one of a crowd of boys who were playing near by. The horse, being a very spirited animal, took fright, and becoming unmanageable, ran away, upsetting the sleigh, and throwing the inmates violently upon a bed of Belgian pavingstones lying in the street. Both parties were severely injured by the fall, and it is feared that the lady cannot survive. This is a serious matter, and the Police should see to it that the laws relating thereto are stringently enforced.

POLICE COURTS.

THE TOMBS—DOWLING, JUSTICE.

A ONE-DOLLAR BURGLARY.

About 5 o'clock yesterday morning Officer HAIGHT, of the Fourth Ward, saw TERRENCE CARROLL, aged 17, on his knees in front of the crockery store No. 15 New Chambers-street, occupied by MATILDA FITZPATRICK. As the window shutters had been forced apart and a pane of glass broken, through which CARROLL had his arm thrust, the officer arrested him, and also JOSEPH FARRELL, aged 17, who was standing by his side. He found them in possession of a lamp, valued at $1, which they had abstracted from the window. The prisoners were subsequently arraigned before the Magistrate and fully committed for trial. They are both natives of Dublin, Ireland, and laborers by occupation.

ANOTHER BURGLARY.

WM. B. BARR, of the St. Nicholas Hotel, appeared in Court yesterday, and stated that on the 19th of November last the Erie Railroad baggage-room, at Pier No. 30 North River, had been feloniously entered by means of a false key, and that the burglars had stolen from thence a quantity of clothing belonging to the complainant, and valued at $34. He also stated that he had cause to suspect JOHN DOLAN, aged 15, a newsboy, residing at No. 88 Baxter-street, of the offence, as he had been informed by RICHARD SEATTON, an employe of the Company, that he found DOLAN in the baggage-room on the day in question, and that the bag containing the clothing had been cut open and the same removed. DOLAN had escaped arrest at that time, and was only secured yesterday by Officer KELLY, of the Third Precinct. The Magistrate held him for trial.

JEFFERSON MARKET—DODGE, JUSTICE.

SNEAK THIEF.

Yesterday an aged German woman, who at the Station-house desired to be styled HANNAH SCHNEIDER, but at the Court claimed to be MARY SCHMIDT, entered the apartment of GEORGE WEAVER, No. 136 Thompson-street, and although he was then asleep in the room, gathered up a suit of clothes worth $30, with which she left. In leaving the room, however, she made a noise which awoke WEAVER, who pursued and arrested her with the stolen articles in her possession. She was committed for trial.

THEFT OF TEA.

TIMOTHY B. ROSS, of No. 290 Water-street, made a complaint alleging that a colored man named ROBT. JOHNSON had been in the habit of stealing tea from the store and carrying it away in his dinner-pail. At the time of his arrest by Officer SIX, of the Eighth Precinct, he was found in possession of one and a half pounds of the tea, and was sent to the Special Sessions for trial.

ESSEX MARKET—SHANDLEY, JUSTICE.

MR. BERGH IN A NEW ROLE.

On Thursday last, WM. WHITE, President of the Dry Dock, East Broadway and Battery Railroad, appeared in Court and desired to make a complaint against HENRY BERGH, but as he was not an eye-witness of the alleged offence, the complaint was made by ISRAEL W. LITTELL, conductor of car No. 15. This document states that Thursday last Mr. BERGH stopped the car, in Greenwich-street, and ordered LITTELL to double up, saying that he could not stand there and see animals poisoned. LITTELL refused, and as Mr. BERGH threatened to arrest driver and conductor if they proceeded further without doubling up, a long hair ensued, and a dozen or more cars were brought to a stand still. LITTELL claimed that his horses, and all others attached to cars on the road, were fully able to perform all the labor required of them, and besides charged that Mr. BERGH had wilfully and maliciously obstructed travel upon the road. Yesterday Mr. BERGH appeared in answer to a request from the Magistrate, and after listening to the reading of the complaint, desired time to consult his counsel to determine whether he would ask for an examination. This request was granted, and the case adjourned.

A BURGLARY.

During the night of the 6th inst., the cigar manufactory of GEORGE BERER, No. 387 East Tenth-street, was entered by burglars, and cigars valued at $300 were stolen. Yesterday Detective MCGOVERN, of the Eleventh Precinct, found 3,000 cigars in the store of SAMUEL POLAK, No. 12 Prince-street, which were identified by BERER as a portion of those stolen from his premises. POLAK claimed that the cigars were his own manufacture, but was arrested and gave bail in $1,000 to answer.

GENERAL CITY NEWS.

CORONER'S CASES.—An inquest was held yesterday by Coroner KEENAN over the remains of Policeman MICHAEL GLEASON, of the Eleventh Ward, who died from the effects of injuries sustained by being run over on the 1st inst., by a City car in Canal-street. The jury rendered a verdict of accidental death....Coroner KEENAN held another inquest yesterday at No. 538 Washington-street, over the body of THOMAS LEARY, aged 36, and a native of Ireland, who fell down the hatchway of the steamship England, at Pier No. 47 North River, and sustained fatal injuries. A verdict in accordance with the facts was rendered....The same Coroner held an inquest yesterday at No. 121 Broome-street, over the remains of RICHARD HALLIS, colored, aged 56, who died there suddenly from disease of the lungs.

THE PHONOGRAPHIC SOCIETY.—An association with the above name has just been organized in this City. Its members are phonographers residing in New-York and Brooklyn; and the main object in view in its establishment is the mutual advancement in the phonographic art of those who join. Frequent meetings will be held, at which practice in writing shorthand will be afforded. Phonographic exercirculators will soon be started on the plan that has been so long in vogue in England. On Friday evening the first election of permanent officers was held, with the following result: President, JAMES M. MYERSON; Vice-President, R. L. DUGDALE; Recording Secretary, CHEEVER E. DODGE; Corresponding Secretary, ALBURN H. KNUM; Treasurer, JOHN I. WATERBURY.

FIRES YESTERDAY.—At 12 o'clock yesterday a fire was discovered in the tennement-house No. 378 East Eighth-street, on the third floor, occupied by FREDERICK BARDES. There was only a child in the room. The flames originated from the stove igniting the fire-boards....At 4:15 o'clock, a fire occurred in LANE'S dining saloon, corner of Hall-place and Seventh-street, caused by a defective flue. Damage $700. Insured in the Globe, Park, Peter Cooper and Williamsburg City Companies for $11,000....At 6 o'clock, a fire occurred in the oil factory of WM. H.
